I think it is unnecessary, but have no objections if you insist upon putting it in; but to suggest that the great object of retaining a preference right for the Government itself to the power sites in navigable streams is to be defeated on the trivial proposition that the time is not limited is a mere quibble. The Senator can propose such an amendment as that.

I do not know that the matter needs any further explanation. It seems to me the amendment is so short and simple that it is readily understood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of any step that safeguards the reclamation policy of the Government. I think it is of vital interest to the western country at least. But I doubt very much whether the amendment of the Senator from Washington would work beneficially. I do not like the idea of divided authority. I think there should be responsibility fixed in one department or another. Our experience has been, I think, that where there has been divided authority it has served to unduly delay any sort of operation. That is true in regard to the entry of public lands in the West at this time. They are passed upon by the Geological Survey, by the Reclamation Service, and by the General Land Office. The consequence is almost interminable delay in securing title to public lands of any description in the West to-day.

I do not apprehend that there will be any difficulty arising by an overexercise of authority or any injudicious exercise of authority by the Secretary of War. I am of opinion that he would consider whether it was best suited for the irrigation enterprise or for the power purposes which the bill contemplates, and if it should be made to appear to him either upon representations from the Interior Department or from the Reclamation Service that a permit should not be granted for a power site, I have not any idea that he would exercise the power or authority the bill gives him.

Therefore, in view of the fear I have of the operation of a division of authority upon these power sites, and in view further of the fact, which we know, of the jealous guardianship of the powers given to any of the departments by that department, I feel that the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a word. I can not allow to go without notice the suggestion of my colleague that those of us who referred to the condition of the reclamation fund recognize or see that the work of the Reclamation Service has come to an end. There is no one who has been more in favor of the Reclamation Service and thinks more of it and has done more to bring it along than I have. When I referred to the condition of that service it was simply that we should face the situation as it is.

There is practically no money in the reclamation fund now that is available for these reclamation projects. At the last session we appropriated the estimate of the department, a little over $8,000,000, for reclamation projects out of the reclamation fund. When they came to allot the money notice was sent out to some of the projects in our State that the applicants allotted certain sums of money could not have the amount Congress had allotted because the fund was short, and it was just about half of what they had estimated to Congress.

Then we passed a law a session or so ago extending the time of payment under the reclamation fund for 20 years so that the money that will come back will come back very slowly. Then we appropriated $20,000,000 a few years ago out of the Treasury into the reclamation fund and that is now a mortgage on the reclamation fund and has to be paid back. So we must face the situation that there is no cash in the reclamation fund, and I am sorry to say that I am afraid there is not likely to be.

The Senator suggests that if as much work had been done in getting money for the reclamation fund as has been expended on this bill we would probably have more. I want to say that I have spent much more time in trying to get money for the reclamation fund than I have in trying to get this bill passed, as far as that is concerned. I have been trying to get money for projects in our State just as my colleague has been trying to do, but we have not been able to get what we ought to receive. We have not been able to get what we need to carry on the projects now under way, and whether we will get it or not I do not know. We will get it if it is possible to get it. I want to do everything in my power to promote the efficiency and the good work of the Reclamation Service and I shall do it.

I have to face another situation in my State, when the Reclamation Service gets money available to take up projects. We have a project known as the Palouse project in our State that has been examined and reported upon. A recommendation was made that reservoir sites should be purchased, and that it is almost imperative that they should be gotten very soon; but there is no money in the fund to get them. The Secretary of the Interior has no money at his command by which he can buy them; but whenever the money does come in I feel that that is the project which in justice to the people of our State ought to be taken up first. When that is to be taken up we do not know; we can not tell.

So it seems to me that this measure offers hope of the reclamation of much of our land, the reclamation of which is away in the indefinite future from any other source.

I suggested in the discussion that in any project the Secretary of War might be taking up the Reclamation Service would present the needs of reclamation. I did not suggest that the Secretary of the Interior or the Reclamation Service had the power to veto the suggestion of the Secretary of War. They have not. We have carefully avoided that proposition. We have voted that down a time or two in the Senate, because we do not want a divided authority. But there is not any question that if a permit is asked for the construction of a dam in a navigable stream in the arid-land States the Reclamation Service will call on the Secretary of War for any possible need of the Reclamation Service or any possible need of irrigation, and the Secretary of War will take that into account and provide for it if possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). In the absence of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], but I am privileged to vote in his absence on this bill. I vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is absent from the Chamber unavoidably and that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. How he would vote if present I do not know.

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Ashurst	Husting	Lee, Md.	Poindexter
Borah	James	Martine, N. J.	Pomerene

So Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 9 strike out line 24 and on page 10, line 1 and line 2 to the word "valuable," and insert:

Which constitutes part of the plant of the grantee and dependent in whole or in part upon it for its usefulness and acquired necessary appurtenant.

Mr. SHIELDS. This amendment has been discussed. It is offered to clear up what was considered an ambiguity in the bill. I ask that it be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HUSTING. Before we vote on the amendment which the Senator from Tennessee has offered, I ask what change it makes in the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think it makes any change. Line 24, on page 9, and the first line of page 10 and the four first words of line 2 were thought to be ambiguous by two of the Senators who discussed it—I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I then told them I would offer an amendment to make it clear.

Mr. HUSTING. Will the Senator please read it as it would read?

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out line 24, page 9, and line 1, page 10, and line 2 to the word "valuable," and insert the words proposed, so as to read if amended:

And upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee which constitutes part of the plant of the grantee and dependent in whole or in part upon it for its usefulness and acquired necessary appurtenant valuable or serviceable—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have another amendment that I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, after line 17, insert the following, being a part of section 10:

The provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, and 13 of this act shall, in so far as applicable in each case, apply to structures erected, maintained, or operated under and in pursuance of the provisions of this section.

Mr. SHIELDS. The object of this is to make the lease of excess power created by dams constructed by the Government subject to the provisions of the bill which provide for the regulations of rates, for taxation and to prohibit the development from becoming a part of a monopoly. I suppose there will be no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I propose another amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 23, after the word "granted," insert the following:

When the permit expires by limitation or is terminated under the provisions of this act the United States may take over, acquire, occupy, and use all the property of the grantee herein described and upon the terms herein provided for such purposes as may be authorized by then existing laws; or the Secretary of War may grant a permit to any person or persons defined in sections 1 and 10 of this act upon the same terms and with the same restrictions and preferences provided in this act and as may be authorized or required by the existing laws who shall take over the property of the original permittee upon the payment of its fair value in all things, as the United States is authorized and required to do, or the Secretary of War may renew the permit to the original permittee upon the same terms and with the same restrictions and preferences and as may be authorized and required by then existing laws.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is also an amendment to make the matters contained in it more explicit. I thought the bill originally allowed the Government of the United States to take the property over and to transfer it to another permittee or to renew the permit. I still think so, but Senators suggested something explicit upon the subject should appear, and the amendment is offered to cure any doubt that may be upon the very important matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have another amendment which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after the word "provision," and before the word "upon," in line 11, it is proposed to insert "concerning the power that enters into commerce," so that it will read:

To enforce the provision concerning the power that enters into interstate commerce upon the complaint of any person aggrieved, or upon its own initiative—

And so forth.

Mr. SHIELDS. That amendment, Mr. President, is offered upon a suggestion that was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that it was not clear how far the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission extended. The amendment is offered to remove all doubt on that subject by confining it to the power that enters interstate or foreign commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment? If not, it is agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the word "mean," it is proposed to insert the words "individuals, any department of the United States Government having authority to exercise the right of a grantee under this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator from Washington to explain the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amendment simply proposes to authorize an individual to make an application for a permit. I do not see why an individual should be excluded and the privilege confined to corporations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is one of the changes which the amendment makes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator first allow me to read the language of the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment, if the Senator will allow me, and I will explain the amendment in full.

The amendment authorizes an individual to make an application, and it also authorizes a department of the Government of the United States to make an application, to the Secretary of War for a permit under this act. It is somewhat in line with the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. JONES] when he was opposing the other amendment which I offered, intended to protect the rights of the Government.

The other amendment which I offered in effect really only gave a preference right to the Reclamation Service of the Government. That amendment was voted down; and the Government, as the bill now stands, can not even be on an equal footing with private citizens in developing its own power plants. I propose to insert these words here in order to give the Government that opportunity.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask that the amendment be restated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the word "mean" and before the word "political," it is proposed to insert "individuals, any department of the United States Government having authority to exercise the rights of a grantee under this act," so that it will read:

And shall be construed to mean individuals, any department of the United States Government having authority to exercise the rights of a grantee under this act, political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment proposing to insert the word "individuals," though I think it is included where the bill says "persons, associations, or companies." That part of the amendment I accept.

As to the language, "any department of the Government," I desire to say that this bill provides that the development may be made by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, which is the usual agency the United States employs for purposes of this kind. This would accomplish the Senator's purpose. The departments are hardly individuals and have no corporate entity. I do not quite grasp the thought that a department could apply for a permit or make a development. It seems to me that the permit should be applied for by the United States or a corporation organized for that purpose. A department is not an individual or a person or a corporation——

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; but it is a governmental agent, Mr. President, which does work of this kind. I have in mind, of course, particularly the Reclamation Service. That service is constantly engaged in making dams and producing power for pumping for reclamation purposes. If you deny the privilege of retaining the site, as was done in voting down the other amendment which I offered, it seems to me that it is as little as could be done to allow the department to make an application for a permit on an equal basis with municipal corporations.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator must not understand me as opposing that, but I wish to put it in a practical shape. If the Senator will modify his amendment so as to make it read "a corporation organized under the laws of the United States" or "by the Congress of the United States for a governmental purpose," I will accept the amendment. I fear, however, it will produce confusion and embarrassment, and I do not believe it is possible to accomplish the Senator's object in that way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's willingness to accomplish the object, but the suggestion he makes would not be practicable at all. If you have to come in and organize a corporation under the laws of the United States in order to get an opportunity to develop a water power, and get an act of Congress to do it, of course it would not be workable at all. Furthermore, a corporation organized under the laws of the United States is not necessarily a United States agent. There are private corporations organized under the laws of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. My suggestion was one organized by the United States for a governmental purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would be difficult, Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota after I shall have answered the last suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to add a few words to my previous observations. Does the Senator from Washington really consider the propriety of allowing these permits to be made to individuals who might not be subject to regulation by public-service commissions? It seems to me that he is opening a door for a situation where the public interest can not be protected so fully as it can be under the provisions of this bill. I hope the Senator does not want to so amend the bill as to leave the interest of the public unprotected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I want to put them in such a way that they can be protected; and I want to protect the rights of an individual to acquire power sites on the same terms as a corporation.

The Senator is mistaken if he intends to convey the idea that nobody but a municipal corporation or a public agency can acquire rights under this act. Private corporations and private associations can do so. Why not allow a private individual to do likewise? I do not know that any private individual will want to do so; but it is repugnant to a sense of justice, it seems to me, to deny to the natural person rights which you confer upon an artificial one. Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply rose to suggest to the Senator from Washington that, so far as the Federal Government or any of its departments are concerned, it would be sufficient to confer the power on the Government itself; and it would exercise that power through any of the bureaus or divisions which it saw fit. Confer the power upon the Government of the United States in terms, and that will be all that will be necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will agree to that, although it seems to me to be somewhat paradoxical that the Government of the United States should make an application to its own Secretary of War. That was the reason I had the idea that it would be more consistent if the Reclamation Service were authorized to do it. I think the Senator from Minnesota is entirely right in his view that all these agencies can act ordinarily in the name of the United States; in fact, they do act in that way, but the way they would have to proceed in order to get a permit under this act, by applying to the Secretary of War, it seems to me, would be a little inconsistent.

Mr. NELSON. What I have suggested would be much broader, because in enumerating there may be some things omitted. If you simply say "the United States," it will be effective for any branch of the Federal Government; and that would be much better than making a specific enumeration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Would not this be the effect of the Senator's amendment: If the word "individuals" stands, the individual would not be under the control of the Secretary of War; in other words, if the Senator's amendment is adopted, then the right of an individual to be free from the control of the Secretary of War would be the same as a political subdivision or a municipality or a corporation, as described in the bill? The Senator does not want, I take it, that any individual shall secure a permit and not be subject to the regulations of the Secretary of War?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I should prefer that individuals be subject to the regulations of the Secretary of War, but we have voted down here the power of the Secretary of War to regulate. To whatever extent the authority of the Secretary of War goes under the bill, of course, I would want it to apply to an individual the same as to a corporation; and it seems to me that it would do so.

Mr. SMOOT. The theory of the bill is, of course, that any individual who should apply for a permit must come under the provisions of the bill as to regulations by the Secretary of War.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. But if the Senator's amendment is adopted, then the Secretary of War would have authority to allow an individual a permit, and he would not be subject to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the Senator evidently misapprehends the amendment. As the bill stands an individual would not be authorized to make an application for a permit. I am not particularly concerned about the amendment, Mr. President. I only suggested it because it seemed to me to be rather strange to confer rights upon corporations which are denied to natural citizens of the United States. If Senators insist upon their objection to that amendment, I do not propose to go on insisting upon it.

The other branch of the amendment, however, is extremely important in the public interest as the least that we can get here in behalf of the Reclamation Service of the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there was one day a discussion here relative to whether or not an individual could be controlled by State public-utility commissions, and it was claimed by some Senators that he could not be so controlled; that the individual was not subject to such control; that the laws of the State referred to public-utility corporations; and for that reason that they were not applicable to indivduals. I believe that such laws can be made applicable by the laws of the State, but that they are not now framed in that way I am quite sure is the fact. However, it seems to me that inasmuch as an individual can easily get out articles of incorporation—any individual can get three friends to join in the applicaton for a charter, as it might be termed——

Mr. POINDEXTER. He might not have three friends; he might have but one.

Mr. SHAFROTH. A man who is able to engage in one of these enterprises is apt to have many friends, and for that reason there would be no trouble. What we want to do is to preserve, above everything else, the right to regulate these matters by State utility commissions; and I should not like any language used that would make it possible to avoid such regulation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will allow me, I think he is perhaps under a misapprehension. I ask him to turn to the bill, on page 2, line 24, where, after the semicolon, this language is found:

> But in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public-utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business.

Under that language the grantee may be a private individual, a municipal corporation, a political subdivision of a State, a public-utility corporation, or other agency. The point is that the State can authorize a single individual to engage in the enterprise. The authority is left in the State to say who can acquire that right. Under this bill the State may make a single individual, a private person, or a partnership, instead of a corporation, its agent. So that the opportunity is given to private persons, but they must be approved by the State authority; and I think the Senator will approve of that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I do approve of that; and there is not any danger, Mr. President, that an individual will escape a regulation that a water-power company does not escape. Whatever regulation the State can impose upon a water-power company, connected up, as such companies are with each other, will search out and find any private citizen who undertakes to engage in the business.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me one word further?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. My desire is—and that is the object of the bill—to provide that whoever acquires this right, whether it be a municipal corporation, a political subdivision of a State, a utility corporation, or an individual, shall still in every case be subject to the regulation and control of the State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree to that.

Mr. NELSON. I would not want a private individual to come in and acquire such a right perfectly independent of State authority. If he comes in, he must come in under the jurisdiction of the State and be subject to State regulation, like other grantees. I think the Senator will agree with me on that point.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. NELSON. And he wants the ultimate control left with the State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator entirely, so far as putting the individual under the same control to which other grantees are subject is concerned. I would prefer that the Secretary of War should have some reserved power, to be exercised, of course, in a just and reasonable way, but as the Senate has decided to depend upon the State jurisdiction for that control, of course every individual, however small a business he may have, should be subjected to the same control and regulation as the largest corporation. However, the amendment which I propose comes in at a different place in the bill and relates to the definition of those who are able to get permits at all under the bill for any purpose. The bill says:

> SECTION 1. That the United States hereby authorizes any of the persons as hereinafter defined, after obtaining the permit of the Secretary of War as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams.

Then it proceeds to define the word "persons," and says:

> That the word "persons," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean both the singular and plural, as the case demands, and shall be construed to mean political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations.

So that no one not within that definition could have any business under this act at all. As I said before, that is not vital. I merely suggested it. It seems to me, however, that I should like to hear some more substantial reason than has yet been given for denying a private citizen, if he chooses to make application for this franchise granted by his Government, the opportunity to secure it. I do not know of any private citizen who wants to do it, but there may be some who may want to do it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator does not want the private citizen to do it if he can not be regulated by the State utility commission, does he?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He can be regulated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. He can by the passage of new laws in some of the States, but I doubt very much whether the law in regard to public utilities refers to individuals, because all business of this kind is done by companies. I never heard of such an enterprise being conducted by an individual for himself. If the State regulative laws do not apply to him we might have a condition where a permit would be given to an individual and yet he could not be regulated at all. We do not want that condition of affairs, and I assume the Senator from Washington does not want it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The debate here makes it clear, then, that Senators in charge of the bill do not propose that an individual citizen shall have this right. If that is the case, and the Senate takes that position, I have nothing further to say on the subject. I have pointed out what seems to me to be a peculiarity of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; that is not the position. If the individual can be regulated by the State utility commission, of course it is all right to include him; but, as an individual can secure an act of incorporation at any time, he is not shut out. For that reason it seems to me it would be safer, inasmuch as the bill has been constructed all the way through with reference to that distinction, not now to change it without knowing what changes will be necessary in every other provision.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It used to be thought pretty liberal if we granted to corporations as full powers as an individual citizen had; but we are advancing, and these days it seems a private citizen has to apologize for not being a corporation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe that an individual citizen ought to have the right, if the exercise of such right by him can be made to fit in with the laws of the State; but I want the individual regulated, just exactly as the corporation is regulated by the public-utility commissions of the State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That has nothing to do with this amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; it has. The amendment includes individuals, and, consequently, as it gives to individuals this right, if the State laws are such that the individuals can not be regulated except by the passage of new laws in the States, then, of course, it might happen that he would not be regulated. I doubt very much, from the standpoint of protection to the public, the wisdom of putting the word "individuals" in the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not wish to repeat too often, but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has just suggested to me what I think has already been pointed out, that there is not a public-utility law in the United States that does not provide for the same regulation of individuals as of corporations. It is not the nature of the person engaging in a public-utility service that subjects him to regulation; it is the kind of service that is subjected to regulation. If a private individual engages in the same kind of business as a public-utility corporation, he comes under the State law for the regulation of that business.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I wish to make a statement so that he may have the benefit of it. The friends of the bill do not agree with me in my opinion that the amendment is not objectionable, even if the correction or modification be made as I suggested. When they stated their views of the matter I changed my mind about it, and I agree with them.

This bill is not framed for reclamation projects; there is no section or line in it for the control of reclamation or irrigation projects of any kind, and such a provision as is now proposed would simply be like driving a piece of dead wood into a tree. It would have no useful or practical place in it. For that reason I withdraw my assent to any part of the proposed amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That will be a great disappointment to my colleague [Mr. JONES], who has been cooperating with the Senator from Tennessee and who has in mind, as he stated a while ago, very properly, in my judgment, that the projects developed under this bill may be used for purposes of irrigation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, certainly; hydroelectricity may be used for pumping water for irrigation purposes, but your amendment is not necessary for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; but the Senator stated that this bill had nothing to do with reclamation and irrigation. That is what the Senator said.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; and the Senator explained that the bill had no provisions in it for regulating a reclamation plant or project.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And yet it is intended that reclamation plants and projects may be developed under this bill. What is there in the bill to prevent it?

Mr. SHIELDS. Such projects have to be regulated by law. Are there not laws in the Senator's State regulating irrigation schemes and plants?

Mr. POINDEXTER. We have laws there regarding the taking of water.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suppose every State that has any reclamation projects in it has such laws.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whatever laws the States have on that subject, these grants will be subject to them; but the Senator is entirely mistaken in saying that reclamation projects can not be carried on under a permit granted by this bill. The power can be used by the party acquiring it for for any lawful purpose that he sees fit. Whether or not it is subject to State regulation depends upon the laws of the State where the plant is situated and where the work in carried on.

That is rather far afield, however, from the proposition of giving the Reclamation Service of the Government an opportunity to acquire a site upon a navigable stream for the erection of a dam upon the same terms and in the same way that other applicants may obtain it. It seems to me that this is a very reasonable request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the word "mean," it is proposed to insert "individuals, any department of the United States Government having authority to exercise the rights of a grantee under this act," so that if amended it will read:

> And shall be construed to mean individuals, any department of the United States Government having authority to exercise the rights of a grantee under this act, political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the subject was debated by the Senator from Washington. I move to amend by inserting the word "individuals" at the place referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the word "mean," it is proposed to insert the word "individuals," so as to read:

> And shall be construed to mean individuals, political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations; and the term "grantee" herein shall mean any such persons to whom shall be granted a permit as herein provided.

Mr. SHIELDS. My attention was withdrawn. Did the Senator from Montana move to amend the bill by inserting the word "individuals"?

Mr. WALSH. I did.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will make no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if there is no further amendment to be offered at this time I shall ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment which I offered on February 28, appearing at page 3708 of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). The Senator from Montana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, at the end of line 23, it is proposed to insert:

> Nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

So as to read:

> In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

Mr. WALSH obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question as to the latter part of his amendment. Beginning with the word "nor," it reads:

> Nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

The Senator knows that in securing the right of way for a pole line the cost, perhaps, for the privilege of setting each pole through private property would be, say, $5 a pole, or in some cases it is $3 per year, or whatever the case may be. Does the Senator mean that just the cost of the privilege shall be taken into consideration, or does he mean that there shall be taken into consideration the cost of securing from the individuals the right to set the pole upon his land as well?

I desire to know the idea of the Senator on that point.

Mr. WALSH. My idea was that whatever amount the grantee was required to pay out in order to get the right of way should be returned to him. The Senator knows how these easements are secured. Parties go out and solicit them. Sometimes they are required to pay a very high price to go through cultivated lands, or close to corrals and stockyards, and that sort of thing. Generally the amount paid is not very great. Sometimes the payment is based upon the number of poles occupied within the land—so much per pole, as is suggested. In other cases a lump annual sum is paid for the privilege of going over the land with whatever poles are necessary; and again a lump sum is paid for the privilege, which is perpetual in its existence. Of course it is always accompanied with the right of traveling over the land in order to effect repairs, and so forth.

My idea about it, the idea I desired to express in the amendment, was this: Fifty years from now the adjacent lands will all be cultivated, or very largely so. They will have increased immeasurably in value, no doubt. Many considerations will be presented which would multiply many times the original cost if the line were to be duplicated. If the grantee were permitted to hold the privilege to occupy the lands of others with the transmission lines, so that the Government was obliged to go elsewhere to get the right of way for the transmission lines, it would undoubtedly be required to pay very heavily for that right; and I did not intend to put the grantee in a position where he could hold up the Government and say, "You have got to give me for this right of way which I have secured just the amount it would cost you now to go out and get a right of way."

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's ideas conform with mine, as to what should be counted as cost in this particular case.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator in further explanation, if he will pardon me, that I should not regard just what the grantee was obliged to pay as by any means determinative of the cost—that is to say, the actual consideration that went to his grantor—because no doubt they would have to have men out in the field to solicit these grants; and every dollar that the grantee was obliged to expend, whether in the way of compensation to the grantor giving the easement or expenses attendant upon securing it, he ought to have back.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say that in the first place, and that is why I made the statement that I agreed with him as to the actual cost in this particular item. If the Senator's amendment as proposed is adopted, however, it would read in this way:

In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation.

If this is adopted, it seems to me that it would require all depreciations in the property to be deducted; but there is no provision, nor is there any in the bill, that all improvements that had been made upon the diversion dams, or the transmission lines, or the transformers, or any part of the system, could be added to the cost.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I intended that it should be.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to read it carefully and see if that would not be the case:

In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation.

It does seem to me that under that language, if the Senator's amendment is adopted, it will be impossible to give the company credit for all of the improvements that they have made, but it specifically provides for "all proper deductions for depreciation."

Mr. WALSH. If I thought that for a moment, I should be very glad to consent to any modification of the language the Senator might suggest which would be appropriate to convey exactly the view which he thinks ought to obtain, because it entirely conforms to my own.

We will assume that the original cost of the works was a million dollars, but after the property was operated for a period of 10 years it was deemed advisable to enlarge them; the dam was built larger, elevated in height, and that would necessitate, of course, the duplication of some of the generating works. It would be necessary to put in new penstocks, and it would be necessary to put in new machinery, and we will say that that cost half a million dollars more. I intend that the grantee shall get that half million dollars. I would say that that would be a part of the cost of the generating works; and the Senator will bear in mind that it is the cost of the generating works and diversion works as they shall be at the end of the period.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, and I agree with the Senator in that regard; but there is no provision made here for improvements that may be made by the company to keep the plant in perfect condition. The Senator may say that that will be taken out of the net earnings of the company. It may or may not be, however.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I did not intend that it should. Of course it will be necessary to expend moneys constantly for repairs.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator a case that is likely to happen with any company.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest that the Senator place in his amendment, where he provides for cost, the words "necessary repairs and replacements."

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call attention to a circumstance that often happens with electric companies. For instance, say 10 years ago, the system had a certain type of transformers, and last year there was an improvement upon it—such an improvement that it would virtually compel the company, in order to be up to date, to discard all of the old transformers upon the system and use the new type. Does the Senator mean by his amendment that in figuring the cost they could figure the cost of the original transformers and also the cost of the improved transformers that they were virtually compelled to put in?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, I should rather say not.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see how an item like that can help but be a part of the cost of the plant. It is just the same as in the case of a factory of any kind. Times come when you have to discard the machinery and put in new machinery. If that were not the case then a new company that would start this year and would only put in the latest and most up-to-date machinery would have an advantage over a company that had been operating, say, for 20 years before with old machinery and was compelled to put in new machinery in order to compete with the new company. In other words, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] suggests, it is impossible to use the obsolete machinery.

Does the Senator believe that the old company that was running for 20 years before should be allowed nothing for the machinery they had purchased at the time the grant was given them by the Government and not be credited for that in any way, but just be credited for what the new plant would cost them after discarding the obsolete machinery?

Mr. WALSH. The problem the Senator puts up to me is presented just as much in the bill as it stands as it would be if the bill were amended as I suggest it should be amended. The bill as it stands provides that in case the Government takes over the property at the end of the 50 years the grantee shall receive the value of the plant; that is, the value as it stands at that time. Of course, we can very readily conceive that the machinery may be thrown into the scrap heap half a dozen times during the period of 50 years, depending upon the development of the art. That is not at all inconceivable. Yet, under the bill, the grantee will be entitled to receive the value only as it stands at the end of that period, notwithstanding that in the various transmutations he has actually put into the thing two or three times the amount of the value that it has at that time. In other words, this matter of replacement is just as much involved in the bill as it stands as it would be in the bill if it were amended as is proposed by me.

I will state to the Senator my own view about that matter. My own view about it is that in neither case should the party be entitled to recover anything on account of machinery that he took out and replaced with new machinery. Of course at the end of the period the relatively new machinery will be there, and he should get the cost of that machinery; and if it is an addition to the original machinery, the original still being there, and both being used, he should have the cost of all. But if the old machinery is absolutely torn out and replaced by new machinery, which does the work that the old machinery did, and something besides, I should say that the cost would mean only the cost of the last machinery; and then it will be up to the grantee to determine whether or not it is a good business proposition for him to change the machinery which he has. Of course that problem addresses itself to every manufacturer, at all times and all places—whether, with the prospects that are before him, he will be justified in tearing out old machinery and replacing it with new.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, but there is this difference to take into consideration: The manufacturer who is compelled to discard his obsolete machinery certainly has an advantage, in one way at least, over the man who begins a business and puts in new machinery at the time the other man has to discard his obsolete machinery to compete. The man who has been in business 20 years, and has been compelled to discard his old machinery, has his business established. He has his customers. He has a well-established line of trade. His goods are known. The people he is serving know exactly what he produces; and he has every advantage in the world of the manufacturer who begins anew. The advantage of the latter is partially offset under those conditions. This bill provides, however, that at the end of the 50 years the Government can take over his business and let some one else continue the business, and he therefore gets no advantage at all of the business he has built up. He loses all that he has lost in obsolete machinery, and gets no advantage at all of the business he has created.

There is that difference, to which I wanted to call the Senator's attention, between the regular, ordinary manufacturer in any line of business and the man who operates under the provisions of this bill which authorizes the Government to take over the plant or lease it to another person or firm.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the point that the Senator makes. It is not without great weight. Of course, the ordinary manufacturer does not operate upon a ground lease terminated at the end of 50 years. He ordinarily occupies in perpetuity the premises upon which his grant is situated, and he makes his arrangements accordingly. But we are electing to treat this property upon an entirely different footing. We are electing to treat privileges of this character as franchises of the same nature and character as those that are granted by municipalities to public-service corporations of one kind or another; to street railways, for instance, as singularly representative in this case.

The street railway company is in exactly the same situation. Its franchise expires at the end of 50 years. It must regulate its business accordingly; and if its franchise provides, as practically all modern franchises do, that the municipality shall have the right at the end of that period to purchase, it has to regulate its business with that contingency before it. Of course, if it had a grant in perpetuity, such as was formerly made in these cases, it could go on and do its business in view of that prospect before it. It could put in new machinery; it could utilize different sources of power for propulsion, and install the necessary equipment to make different varieties of power available to it. But if it has to give up at the end of 50 years, either on the basis of the value that the property then has or upon the basis of the cost of the plant, those features have to be taken into consideration; and in any case the question of the wisdom of making replacements, of scrapping its old machinery and putting in new and improved machinery, addressing itself to the company as a business proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the bill as written is perfectly fair, wherein it says:

> In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State, no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted.

Or, in other words, anything that the Government of the United States grants to the grantee shall not increase in value by the lapse of 50 years. In other words, at the end of 50 years the grantee must turn over to the Government, if the Government exercises its rights under the bill, the property that was granted to it by the Government, at actual cost.

In the case of a street railroad, referred to by the Senator, where a municipality purchases the railroad at the end of the granted franchise, I know of no instance where there has been a provision that it shall be taken over at other than a fair cash valuation; and if there is a dispute as to the valuation, then that is decided in the courts. I think that would be the only way in which such a case could be properly decided.

In this bill as reported it seems to me that the provisions made for recapture are just to the Government of the United States as well as to the grantee; for the grantee agrees to surrender at the end of the term just what was granted him by the Government, and to receive no more than the actual cost of it.

I can not see why this amendment of the Senator's should be adopted, because I believe that under the wording of the amendment the grantee will not be entitled to receive more than the actual cost of the diversion and generating works or appurtenances or the land on which they may be situated, while at the same time there is to be deducted all depreciation of the property. I think that is unjust. I do not believe it is right as between the Government of the United States and the grantee.

I do believe, with the Senator, that the grantee should not be paid for his plant or the property with all of its connections more than a fair going price, and I do not believe that he should be paid for the property granted by the Government one cent more than he in turn paid the Government at the time the permit was given him.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator from Utah sits down, I should like to have him express to the few Senators present his view about another feature that is involved in this amendment, to which I invited his attention the other day. He agrees—he asserts, indeed—that it is a wise provision here that nothing shall go to the grantee on account of rights which he acquires from the Government under this bill practically for nothing; but the Senator knows that water rights will be necessary—that the grantee must acquire water rights under the laws of the Western States.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What does the Senator think of paying the grantee for those water rights, whatever value they shall have at the end of 50 years, he having appropriated them under the laws of our States without having paid a cent for them?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the property, if taken over, ought to be taken over at a fair cash valuation. Whatever those rights would be worth at the end of 50 years—and I will say to the Senator that that is problematical; I do not believe they will be worth in 50 years what they are to-day—but whatever they are worth, I believe that if the property is taken over by the United States, or the right to continue the operation of it is granted by the Government to any other person or corporation, the actual fair cash value of the property should be paid to the original owner.

Mr. WALSH. I was asking the Senator specifically with reference to the water rights which are acquired, not under this act, but under the laws of the State, and for which nothing whatever is paid.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if a person or corporation develops a property and builds up a successful business, that gives a value to the water; and for whatever value the establishment of the business has given to the water, I believe that the parties so creating that value ought to be paid. I can not say to the Senator, of course, what that would be. I can not say that it should be any particular amount per horsepower, for that would depend upon the surrounding markets and the conditions that were existing at the time, and it would also depend upon how rapidly the demand for the power had increased, and whether their business was profitable or whether unprofitable. All those questions would have to be taken into consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will venture to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he has any hope of completing the bill this evening?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think the bill can be finished this evening.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have had a week of hard work, and it is Saturady night, and it seems to me that it might be well for the school of conversation to adjourn about this time. What does the Senator think?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to take a few minutes further for the discussion of a matter which I think is of very great importance; and perhaps I can do so at this time, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I have tried to be here most of the time during the week for the purpose of making a quorum and to take part in the several votes that have been had, and I personally feel that I have inhaled about as much bad air during the last six days as is good for my health. I really think the Senator will see the propriety of taking a recess—or an adjournment, as may suit his convenience best—at this time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I agree that the Senator from New Hampshire has been a very close attendant, and I want to comply with his wishes. I think we might settle the question as to a recess by a motion or an agreement at this time. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate recess not later than 6 o'clock, and that when the Senate does so recess it shall be until 12 o'clock Monday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not quite understand that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not later than 6 o'clock. Why not now?

Mr. SHIELDS. I want further to explain to the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] desires to present at this time some remarks on a different subject. The pending bill will be laid aside.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. Then I will feel at liberty, I suppose, to take a personal recess, if I care to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be understood that when the Senator from Florida concludes his remarks the Senate will take a recess.

Mr. KERN. Or go into executive session. There are some nominations to be referred.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the effect of the suggestion I make.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee requests that the Senate agree to take a recess not later than 6 o'clock. Without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is a unanimous-consent agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I know very little about the bill under consideration, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if it might not be well to have the bill reprinted with the amendments which have been agreed to, so that we can see on Monday morning precisely what form the bill is in?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask unanimous consent that an article by Mr. Hugh L. Cooper, a very prominent hydroelectric engineer, which appears in the Outlook of a recent number, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATER POWER.

[By Hugh L. Cooper.]

(The author of this article is a well-known hydraulic engineer. His best known work is the great hydroelectric plant on the Mississippi River at Keokuk, Iowa. He speaks with experience, knowledge, and authority on the subject of water power.—The Editors.)

"To gather the streams from waste and to draw from them energy, labor without brains, and so to save mankind from toil that it can be spared, is to supply what, next to intellect, is the very foundation of all our achievements and all our welfare."—From a decision handed down by Justice Holmes in the United States Supreme Court on January 24, 1916.

The strength of any nation can in a large degree be measured by the intelligence shown in the development of its natural resources. While the United States is endowed with a great natural resource in its water powers, only about 30 per cent of our water powers have been developed, and the remaining 70 per cent are lying idle, and practically no new developments have been inaugurated in the last seven years. The question arises, What is the matter? A reply would seem to comprehend some historical data, the value of these resources to the public, how to secure these values, and what results may be reasonably expected if the industry is restored to a healthy state of growth.

Water power as a provider of human necessity is an agency several thousand years of age, but more progress in its use has been made in the last 25 years than in all of the time that has gone before. Present-day industrial and economic standards have made power a public necessity, and invention, notwithstanding all its losses and failures, continues to furnish new facilities for our needs at a rate which makes intelligent realization of them an impossibility. For example, the modern use of water power has become possible only through the instrumentality of much intricate and special apparatus. One instance is the present-day hydraulic governor, which is an indispensable factor in any hydroelectric plant, though representing only about 1 per cent of its cost. Its function, as its name indicates, is to control, which it does automatically and instantly. It regulates the amount of water delivered to the water wheel to suit the various conditions imposed by the consumer. It has cost 15 years of time and around two millions of money to perfect this governor. All of the apparatus and parts constituting the remaining 99 per cent cost of a hydroelectric plant would serve for approximately similar illustration, and the scrap piles in the wake of their development and perfection are monuments to innumerable failures and losses such as are incident to the evolution of every great mechanical and industrial achievement.

Many new twentieth-century blessings might be enumerated, and the question arises, How did they come into practical being? By legislative fiat and Government control? No; they are the direct result of brain competitions in which the spirit of achievement and the hope for the regard of their fellows and reasonable financial reward have spurred on countless thousands of men through defeat after defeat to final success. The spirit of competition overcomes the greater part of the obstacles in human progress, thus providing most of the blessings we enjoy, and the corresponding list in the fiat column is painfully small.

Water-power development in the United States is at a very low ebb, and many are asking why. The ever-rising standards of living make the demand for power greater each year. In 1850 we used three-tenths of a ton of coal per capita per annum. To-day we use twenty times as much, and most of this is for industrial power purposes. Seven hundred and fifty thousand miners produced the coal we consumed in 1913, at the rate of 760 tons per miner per annum. By the year 1940 we will probably be using 1,200,000,000 tons of coal per annum and require 1,600,000 miners. A practical economic question may well here arise. Have we the coal and what will be the probable cost of it? Statistics show that we have the coal for many years to come, but also show that the economical deposits are being worked first, and, as the coal becomes deeper, the costs increase rapidly.

Also it is realized by observing persons that the labor supply of the world is being rapidly destroyed, to what final extent no one can estimate. The best statisticians in Europe agree that when the war now raging is over at least 14,000,000 men will have been withdrawn from the world's field of labor. No one can deny that such a reduction in the supply of labor, together with the new political power the labor then remaining will possess, will create a corresponding increase in the demand for and cost of labor. This must result in a world-wide increase in the cost of coal and all other commodities.

It is unreasonable to suppose that Europe will permit itself to be further impoverished by emigration after the war has done its work and the men left will be so badly needed at home. The tide Europeward will be stemmed only by an increase of wages in this country sufficient to keep our present foreign labor. If the foregoing is good reasoning, then are we not now in a zone of shortage of labor that will affect the coal supply and price and affect materially every other walk of life, especially agriculture and manufacturing?

The above question may well be asked. An analysis of Government statistics shows that, where we are now paying $14.20 per capita per annum for coal for our population, by 1940 we will be paying $22.60 per capita. This means a constantly increasing tax on all our people, from which they have the right to relief if relief is possible. Reliable data show that the efficiency of steam-power development has practically reached its maximum. If this is true, and the cost of coal is to go up and the needs of the people for power are constantly increasing, how can the situation be relieved? The answer is by the development of our water power as rapidly and as fully as it can be accomplished without any sacrifice of the public interest.

Let us now, having considered the necessity for water power, see what the important facts are regarding it. The average cost of a water power per horsepower may be taken at about five times that of steam, and in addition the difficulties in raising money and the cost of money for water powers are much greater than for steam, because the steam plant is free from flood hazards in construction and operating periods and it can be constructed in small units about as the market requires, whereas the water power usually has to be greatly overdeveloped and then wait for its market to grow up to it, thus entailing large additional interest costs while securing and waiting for business. The water power requires for operation about one-fourth the amount of labor that steam power requires; therefore the water power conserves labor as well as coal.

The United States Government estimates show about 60,000,000 horsepower now undeveloped in the United States. Probably 15,000,000 of this horsepower is worth developing under present conditions. As to the value of the 15,000,000 horsepower to our people when its development is completed much can be said. The larger proportion of this undeveloped power is in the South and West, where there are room and need for great industrial expansion if the South and West are to enjoy the industrial advantages that obtain in New England. Fifteen million utilized horsepower means the conservation of about 100,000,000 tons of coal per annum, costing at this time about $225,000,000 annually in the boiler furnaces, and the conservation of the labor of about 280,000 miners and steam station operatives annually for other uses; $225,000,000 would buy 2,250,000 acres of good cultivated farm land. Suppose, instead of wasting, as we now are, $225,000,000 worth of coal and labor per annum, in some way we were destroying 2,250,000 acres of our farms every year, how long would it take our good voters to make a noise that would be heard and acted upon in Washington, to the end that the farm destroying would cease? And yet that in effect is exactly what is going on to-day in the water-power field. The 280,000 laborers would be available for other safer, more useful, and healthful employment, affording general relief to the agricultural and manufacturing industries.

The development of our remaining water powers is not only important from a coal and labor-saving standpoint but from the standpoint as well of new industries that we need in the United States which can not be based on coal or oil power. Among such industries are the manufacture of fertilizers, nitric acid for explosives, many electrochemical products, high-grade steel, irrigation pumping, and other general and very useful industries requiring cheap power that are now unable to locate here. Over 1,250,000 horsepower has been developed in Norway and Sweden in the last 10 years for the manufacture of nitric acid and fertilizers, and no similar progress has been made in the United States. We now import more than $50,000,000 worth of materials a year for fertilizers and explosives in this country, all of which could in time be produced in our own country. It is common report that designs are now being perfected in Canada for the development of water power where American capital to the eventual tune of about $75,000,000 plans to manufacture fertilizers and nitric acid for consumption for the most part in the United States. Another large and beneficial use of power is that of pumping water for large irrigation projects in the West. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of land now valueless which will, if cheap power can be secured, be made productive and valuable. Many other similar instances could be noted if space permitted.

Hydroelectric engineering is a new science, and it has had to be learned in the usual expensive though very instructive school of experience. The art is less than 30 years old, and the first 22 or 23 years had to be spent in education, and as a result a lot of investors, not only in the United States but all over the world, were bitterly disappointed. In the United States alone poor engineering and undue optimism caused, from 1900 to 1910, 12 water powers to go into liquidation; more than 600,000 horsepower of developments and $120,000,000 worth of disappointed capital went on the black list with investors. This unfortunate stage of engineering has now happily passed; but about the time that engineers had learned their lesson and were able conservatively to design and estimate water-power plants, and about the time the optimists and commercial men had learned that it is necessary to sell hydroelectric power for about 65 per cent of the cost of steam power, along came a wail all over the United States because, it was said, a so-called Water Power Trust was robbing the people, and then began a campaign in Government circles and in magazines that reduced the water-power industry to its present state of innocuous desuetude. Much literature was distributed all over the country for the purpose of acquainting the American people with the alleged wonderful and deplorable discovery that the water powers of the country were being grabbed by a so-called Water Power Trust which was making undue and tremendous profits out of this natural resource. As only one side of the question was presented, the story was believed and water-power companies have been looked upon with suspicion ever since. Whatever the object of this unwarranted attack, the average citizen who has given no extended thought to this question is possessed with the idea that the water-power industry has been a very profitable one and that there exists a water-power trust which is engaged in grabbing everything in sight. Any intelligent truth seeker who has honestly investigated the subject has found that no water-power trust exists now or ever has existed, and, furthermore, never can exist in the face of a steam competition which no aggregation of capital could possibly control; that no banker is seeking investment in new water projects; that practically every banker who has ever made an investment of this class for his clients will recite a hard-luck story of disappointed expectations and hopes; that the market has been flooded with prospectuses and reports on projects which no substantial investment interest will take up because of the present general unpopularity of water-power securities.

The popular theory that water powers provide an easy road to wealth is not shared by anyone of experience in the industry. The uninitiated are naturally not aware of the many hazards connected with most water-power developments. Without going into details, I will merely suggest that a little thought upon the subject will convince any intelligent person that the hazards attached to both the construction and operation of hydroelectric plants are greater than those attached to almost any other class of business that can be mentioned.

It is a great pity that prior to the rigors of the Government restrictive action an intelligent official investigation of the subject was not made. If such investigation had been made, it is certain that the action would not have ensued, and from that time until now about 2,000,000 horsepower now going to waste would have been developed with its attending blessings to the public, including the conservation of a coal and labor cost of more than $100,000,000. In 1907 Gov. Hughes was the only governor out of 27 governors in the United States who recognized that "justice first" was a fundamental principle always working for the greatest good to the greatest number. He alone of 27 governors in other States whose legislatures had passed similar laws vetoed a 2-cent railway fare law passed by the New York Legislature, on the ground that it was the duty of the legislature first to ascertain what was a just rate, and then establish it. The action of Gov. Hughes showed an intelligence that some day will be demanded by the people of all their representatives; and when "justice first" is on the desks of a majority of our legislators, then, and not before, the water-power question and a lot of other questions will get the best solution in the public interest.

As a result of the campaign above noted and the absence of any investigation disclosing water-power facts and conditions, laws were passed that have practically stopped development all over the United States on navigable rivers and public lands, and the Federal laws passed governing these two classes of development, which are still in effect, make it impossible, on account of restrictions, regulatory provisions, and revocable permits, to secure capital from any source. For a time after these laws were put into effect some money for American water powers was secured in England, France, and Belgium; but this source of supply is now, for a very long time, if not permanently, destroyed by the European war. It therefore becomes necessary to secure American capital for all future developments, and in order to accomplish this the laws must be changed so that they will provide security and fairness for the investor and consumer, and at the same time fully protect the public interest. Under the existing laws there may be granted the right to build a dam on the public lands of the United States and operate it for an indeterminate period, but at any time all rights can be revoked by a Secretary of the Interior in his discretion without a hearing, and such action has actually been taken. Manifestly such an experiment was doomed to failure, and the idea is without any present advocacy and is mentioned as one of the evils of legislation passed without knowledge of the subject legislated about.

It is stated by some who oppose changing the present laws for development of water power on public lands that there is no necessity or demand for additional developments in the West, because some existing power companies have sufficient power unsold to supply the present and near future market. The suggestion by Government officials that great areas of territory in the West and South shall be deprived of industrial growth through water-power assistance until these few restricted districts have consumed all their developed power is so unfair and unsound economically as to be almost pitiful. Our railways had to overdevelop that the country might develop, and the same is true of the water-power industry. It can also be said that in the entire United States to-day there is not a single water power developed than can offer power terms justifying the establishment of fertilizer works, electrochemical works, large irrigation projects, or nitrogen fixation plants. It can also be said that there are now tentatively under serious consideration in the United States new developments that will call for more than $75,000,000, all waiting for encouraging legislation only. Must our unnecessary importations, amounting to $50,000,000 a year, and many other crying needs, wait until a few Western plants can sell out a small amount of power now unsold? I do not think the people will take kindly to this idea. Furthermore, if it should turn out in the future that more power is developed than can be immediately sold, such a condition is hardly one which the public or the Government need worry about, so long as the people reserve to themselves the right to regulate power rates.

Another little known fact about water power that bears upon the question with peculiar force at this time is the one of profit in water-power investments. Steam competition has driven the prices for power lower and lower for the past 25 years, and, while the cost of practically every other human necessity has been mounting upward each year, the cost of power has been steadily going downward, and this process was strongly established long before State public-utility commissions were created. For water powers to compete with these steadily declining steam costs has been very difficult. In 1912 over 5,000 power stations investigated by the Department of Commerce showed that the steam stations were earning a surplus of 4.1 per cent above fixed charges and the water-power companies were earning only 1.78 per cent. This 1.78 per cent showing is a fine tribute to the financial genius and grabbing results of the alleged Water Power Trust. Investors will not be attracted to securities afflicted with strong competition and many and great risks, legal, commercial, and physical, for a surplus anything like as low as 1.78 per cent; and the reason for their attitude is easily found in the fact that the investors can go into many other safer fields and make much more.

That the water powers of the country are not being developed and that this lack of development is a grave industrial calamity are facts the accuracy of which can not be successfully challenged. The question, then, arises as to what is needed to cause the business to revive and assume its proper place in our national life. I believe that the following conditions should exist in the laws governing water-power development in order to make it possible to place this class of securities at home, where they should be owned; they can not hereafter be sold abroad, anyway.

In the first place, the franchise term should be irrevocable in character and for not less than 50 years. At the end of 50 years the Government should have the right to take over the property of the power company by paying for the fair value of the property, the franchise rights and lands contributed by the Government to be excluded from payment. The lessee should have the right to continue until the property is taken over. There should be no Federal charge on the water power except such small amount representing rental value of land and cos of Government administration of the lease so long as its steam and other water-power competitors are not similarly charged. It is a well-recognized fact that any substantial Federal charges must be paid by the consumer, because there is no one else to pay them. Why, therefore, should new sets of consumers be obliged to pay additional charges which present consumers are not assessed?

On the question of Federal charges. Suppose the United States Government should say to the farmers in the country, "On all the wheat you sell in your own State you need pay no charge, but on any wheat subject to interstate freight rates, which rates we have jurisdiction over, you must pay the United States Government 1 cent per bushel." What legislator could survive such an advocacy? Yet in what way is the proposal more unjust than to make a charge on water powers that the Government takes dominion over, letting the 6,000,000 horsepower already developed go free from any such charge? Justice first would exclude the imposition of any such load. The general public may be said to be the power-consuming public, and anything done to increase the cost of constructing or operating power plants becomes a charge on the public. One of the greatest factors in the cost of a power plant is the cost of securing the money to build it. Water-power investments should be taxed by the States in which the plants are located, the same as any other business concern is taxed, but should not in addition have to bear a Federal charge which will be paid by the public through increased power rates and through increased cost of securing money. It would be just as reasonable for the general borrowing public, including farmers and manufacturers, to advocate legislation which would force the banks to increase the rates at which money could be loaned to them as to urge or permit laws which make the securing of money for water-power development more costly. If the water-power business were one of great profit or ever had been, if the business by its very nature and by its very competitive environments were not always forcing prices to the consumer downward, and if the prices now being paid by consumers generally were not greatly less than coal-produced power costs, then there might be some justification for stretching a point as against other industries and levying a charge, because the water powers really belong to the whole people.

Upon the question of regulation of rates to be charged by a water power, the rates the consumers pay should be fixed by the consumers themselves through their own public-service commissions in all States which have commissions. The regulation of rates by any Cabinet officer is wrong in practice, except temporarily pending the establishment of commissions in a few States which still lack them. If the rates fixed by the State commissions are unfair to either power companies or consumers, either party can appeal to the people and eventually secure justice. As the consuming public through the commissions regulate the rates which they pay for power, and as the rates must be sufficiently high to include all taxes and Federal Government charges, as well as any increased interest cost on the investment occasioned thereby, is it not in the direct interest of the consuming public to insist upon all laws which will enlist money at the lowest possible rates, thereby materially aiding themselves to lower power rates?

What, then, may we expect if laws regarding water power are made attractive to American investors? We may expect low rates and a gradual and certain revival of water-power installation. Tentative plans for the expenditure of more than $75,000,000 in this class of work are now awaiting the enactment of fair laws. Every dollar of this investment will aid in creating a cheaper human necessity for the people and place no new burden on anybody's back. We may also expect that the 15,000,000 horsepower still undeveloped will yearly grow less and less, and finally this undeveloped resource will take its rightful place and be a great benefit to our population all over the land; that many millions we now send out of our country annually for necessary products will be kept at home. If we are a Nation of red-blooded men capable of providing for and defending ourselves from within, we will make our own fertilizers and much-needed chemicals and explosives, instead of depending upon foreign countries, as we do now. If space permitted, much more could be said regarding the blessings that are easily obtainable by the passing of conservative and encouraging laws. Why not pass them?

"THE REAL TRUTH ABOUT OUR WATERWAYS."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana, which has been printed heretofore in the Manufacturers' Record relating to waterways.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REAL TRUTH ABOUT OUR WATERWAYS.

[By JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and United States Senator from Louisiana.]

[Senator RANSDELL, in response to a request from the Manufacturers' Record, has prepared a thoroughly comprehensive and completely convincing reply to ex-Senator Burton's recent attack on the present plan of improving rivers and harbors, printed in the January issue of Munsey's Magazine. Mr. RANSDELL has long been a leader in rivers and harbors improvements, both through his work as a Member of the House of Representatives and later of the Senate, and also as president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. In his reply to Mr. Burton, Senator RANSDELL quotes from documentary evidence and completely refutes the arguments and statements advanced by Mr. Burton, and out of his own mouth proves Mr. Burton to have changed recently from an ardent advocate to a bitter opponent of rivers and harbors improvements. In justice to the very important and highly patriotic work of developing the rivers and horbors of this country, Senator RANDALL'S reply is presented here in full and is commended to the consideration of the voters of this country.—Editor Manufacturers' Record.]

In the January Munsey Magazine ex-Senator Burton, of Ohio, has an article on "The truth about our waterways" which is so unfair that it can not be allowed to pass unnoticed, and the real truth must be told. He makes many statements that are positively incorrect, and the general tenor of his article evinces the strongest antagonism to the improvement of interior streams on which freight is carried in competition with railroads. He tries to prejudice the public against the wisdom of making expenditures on interior rivers and canals. In carrying out his purpose he indulges in such harsh criticism of certain waterways and methods of legislation that his strictures amount to serious libels against many public-spirited citzens who advocated these improvements, against the Engineer Corps of the Army, which approved them, and against Congress, which made the appropriations for them.

Space does not permit a full reply, but some of the most glaring errors will be pointed out. Mr. Burton was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House for 10 years, from December, 1898, to March, 1909, and during his six-year term in the Senate was a member of the Senate Commerce Committee, which has charge of river and harbor legislation. During all this time he was generally regarded as the best-posted man on waterways in America. I shall take up and reply categorically to the principal misleading assertions of Mr. Burton's article, and propose to refute him out of his own mouth.

A MISTAKE OF $190,000,000.

He says:

1. "To date the United States Government has spent a little more than three-quarters of a billion dollars in work on our rivers and harbors, about two-thirds for rivers and one-third for harbors. The investment in harbors has for the most part been profitable. * * *"

I agree with Mr. Burton that the "investment in harbors has for the most part been profitable." It is certainly not true, however, that two-thirds of the appropriations for rivers and harbors have been spent on rivers and only one-third on harbors. Precisely the reverse is correct. A tabulation made from the report of the Chief of Engineers shows that $434,000,000 have been spent on harbors and only $310,000,000 for rivers—nearly two-thirds for harbors and only slightly over one-third for rivers, a trifling mistake of $190,000,000 on Mr. Burton's part.

In totaling the appropriations for harbors Mr. Burton does not take into consideration such streams, for example, as the Hudson at New York City, the Penobscot from Bangor, Me., to the sea; the Delaware below Philadelphia, the Mississippi below New Orleans, etc. These are unquestionably harbors, and appropriations for them should be classed as harbor appropriations. In his Munsey article Mr. Burton says: "The term 'river' is often applied to streams which in a proper analysis are not really rivers. They are rather estuaries or inlets from the ocean." Here he gives the examples above named and continues: "Such 'rivers' are really tidal streams connecting large ports with the ocean, and they fall more accurately under the classification of harbors."

Therefore, applying the test of his own definition of a harbor, we discover at the very outset of Mr. Burton's article a misstatement involving nearly $200,000,000. Hence, $434,000,000 of the appropriations fall into Mr. Burton's "profitable" class, and only $310,000,000 are open to criticism by him.

2. "Fully one-half of the amount expended on rivers has been wasted." This is for the most part fiction. Mistakes and wastes have been made in river appropriations as in everything before Congress, but not more than in the Army and Navy bills, not a third as much as in public-buildings bills, and it is infinitesimal by comparison with pension bills, which are full of real pork, and genuinely wasteful.

MR. BURTON NOT A FRIEND OF RIVERS.

3. "The most conspicuous defect * * * is the policy of making partial and wholly inadequate appropriations * * * without providing for finishing the work." This is true to some extent, but because a system has its defects it does not follow that it is vicious. The truest friends of waterway improvement favor the continuing contract on all important projects and much larger appropriations than in the past, so that work may progress more rapidly. A near approach to this has been secured during the past seven years by changing from triennial to annual river and harbor bills, and by increasing materially the amounts allotted to several large streams, such as the Ohio, the Columbia, the Black Warrior, the upper Mississippi, the lower Missouri, and the Mississippi below Cairo. When Mr. Burton was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House a number of important harbor projects and some connecting links between harbors, such as the Detroit and St. Marys River, were placed under continuing contract, and large sums authorized to finish them, but no great river that was a competitor of railroads was so fortunate. Mr. Burton in those days was almost supreme in waterway legislation, and it is his fault that rivers are not better provided for. He watched out closely for harbors, which are railway terminals, but took little interest in trying to complete rivers, the rivals of railways. Let him explain this attitude if he can.

It must not be understood, however, that I am antagonistic to railroads. On the contrary, I am distinctly friendly to them. The great trinity of transportation is road, rail, and river, and it is only by the full and complete cooperative development of all of these agencies that the most beneficial results can be obtained. Each has its own particular province in the transportation world, and they should be supplementary to and cooperative with each other.

4. The idea is conveyed that river and harbor advocates desire rivers improved as rate regulators whether any commerce is carried on the streams or not. This may be partially correct, but not generally, and the better judgment is that the Government should not improve rivers unless they are to be actually used as efficient carriers of freight, as well as regulators of rail rates. This is my personal opinion, and I am sure that the big majority of waterway advocates feel the same.

CHAIRMAN BURTON CONTRADICTS CANDIDATE BURTON.

5. "A commission should be created, preferably composed of the Secretaries of War, of the Interior, and of Commerce, with or without other members from civil and military life, to study the whole question and recommend a proper policy for inland waterway and harbor projects."

This and the whole tenor of Mr. Burton's article is an attack on the present method of making river and harbor appropriations, and an arraignment of the Engineer Corps of the Army, which has charge of waterway improvements. Mr. Burton recommends a commission to do what is now being done, and very ably done, by the Army Engineers. The best answer to this is to quote from Mr. Burton before he became a candidate for President. He was chairman of the National Waterways Commission, composed of Senators and Representatives, which made an exhaustive study of the question of waterway improvements both in America and Europe, and on page 78 of its final report, prepared mainly by Mr. Burton, and filed in the Senate in 1912, I find these words:

"Numerous propositions have been made for the creation of a board of public works, or other body, which shall decide upon the feasibility and desirability of propositions for expenditures on rivers and harbors. The commission is unwilling to recommend a change of this kind, and points to the fact that the past recommendations of the Engineer Corps have been carefully prepared and with a degree of expert knowledge and comprehension of the commercial needs of the country which could not well be supplied by any other body or organization. The advantages which attach to the Engineer Corps are obvious. The members are in the permanent service of the Government, and are free from those influences which would inevitably be brought to bear upon men in civil life. Those engineers now engaged in the work are carefully trained in the planning and execution of these improvements, and have special qualifications for judging the feasibility and the cost of proposed river and harbor projects."

I can add nothing to these words, which I unqualifiedly indorse.

BURTON'S STATEMENTS ERRONEOUS.

6. Mr. Burton speaks of "the continual waste of public funds for political purposes under the guise of improving our rivers and harbors," and adds:

"An item of $50,000, or even $100,000, attracts no particular attention in a river and harbor bill. Indeed, it is generally felt that a congressional district is entitled to that much recognition of its existence, and the vote goes almost unnoticed through the House and Senate. * * * We must eliminate the congressional district apportionment from their make-up."

And later he calls attention to—

"The waste and extravagance which have brought disrepute to the annual 'pork-barrel' bills."

These statements are pure fictions, without any foundation in fact, and the warrant for them exists solely in Mr. Burton's fertile imagination.

River and harbor legislation is more carefully safeguarded than any other enacted by Congress. It is surrounded by a system of checks and balances, as I will show later, which make it practically impossible for any unworthy project to be considered, and no river and harbor project has been authorized under the present system that was not possessed of genuine merit. Congressional districts are not considered in preparing river and harbor bills, but each project rests upon its own merits, as shown in the reports of the United States Army Engineers.

River and harbor bills are not pork-barrel bills; they are commerce builders.

A DEADLY PARALLEL.

Mr. Burton, in making these charges of "waste," "political influence," "congressional district apportionment," and "pork," occupies a peculiarly paradoxical position, for in my 16 years in Congress I have never heard more splendid and convincing refutations of such slanders than those which fell from the lips of Mr. Burton himself. He is a presidential candidate now, and perhaps he sees through a glass darkly, but for many years, when chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, he was considered the best-informed and most influential man in America on waterways. I shall let Chairman Burton reply to Presidential Candidate Burton.

In 1902 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 35, p. 2911), in defending the rivers and harbors bill of that year on the floor of the House, Chairman Burton said:

"We have pursued no plan of compromise. We have considered no plan of dividing appropriations according to States or localities or membership in this House. We have endeavored to consider every project according to its merits, and made that the sole criterion as to whether it should be included in the bill or not."

In December, 1909, addressing the convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, of which I was president, Senator Burton (see convention proceedings, p. 106) said:

"My friends, the president of this congress will say to you that we have known no North, no South, no East, no West in the years we have been together. We have taken up projects according to the measure of their merit, and I can vouch that members of the committee in many instances have leaned over backward where their own localities were involved and have given closer attention to projects in other places. * * * You have had to meet the idea that there is a pork barrel somewhere. Whenever there is a man of superficial information on this subject, or one who has had some project that has been turned down, and turned down hard because it had to be turned down, that man begins to talk about the pork barrel. There has been no line of appropriations made by this Government more carefully guarded than appropriations for rivers and harbors. * * * I challenge anyone to cite an instance where that bill has ever been made up to gratify certain localities or to advance the interests of some Member of Congress in the House or Senate. * * * There has been no logrolling, no pork barrel, no regard for individual prospects or anything of the sort, no regard for any particular locality in the country."

Nothing I can say can more effectively refute the charges of Candidate Burton than his own clear and convincing statements just quoted.

THE BUZZ OF THE PRESIDENTIAL BEE.

Surely, in the opinion of Mr. Burton in 1909, there was no "waste of public funds for political purposes under the guise of improving our rivers." No congressional district at that time was "felt to be entitled to an item of $50,000 to $100,000." There was no "pork barrel," no logrolling, then. Yet in six short years, without any change in the method of making river and harbor appropriations, when we have followed rigidly the beaten path, and when, if any errors have been made, they have been on the side of too much conservatism and too little regard for the commercial needs of our country, we find Senator Burton leading filibusters on the floor of the Senate against the very appropriations he so highly extolled in 1909. His attitude shows a complete change of front. If he was right in 1909, and his statements of that period were corroborated by his consistent attitude in the House of Representatives as chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and by a practically unanimous sentiment in Congress, then he is wrong now. Let him take whichever horn of the dilemma he wishes.

Has the sinner seen the error of his ways and put on the garb of repentance? Has the leopard changed his spots? Is Mr. Burton convinced that during his 10-year chairmanship sufficient money was looted from the Public Treasury and "wasted for political purposes," and that we must now call a halt? Or is the cause of the sudden "conversion" of Presidential Candidate Burton to be found in some other motive? It is only he who has changed; the method of making river and harbor bills is substantially the same now as for the past 20 years. They were wise and beneficial six years ago, as Mr. Burton himself asserted; they are wise and beneficial now. He is wrong, not our river and harbor legislation.

But let us see what was Mr. Burton's attitude in actual legislation during his chairmanship of the Rivers and Harbors Committee toward the appropriations he now so bitterly attacks. Under his leadership appropriations for waterways became much more liberal. The total authorization for these works prior to the beginning of his chairmanship was $329,896,120, while during his 10-year tenure they amounted to $245,292,455. Hence it will be seen that while Mr. Burton was chairman about three-fourths as much money was appropriated as during the preceding 109 years since the birth of the Republic. If, therefore, river and harbor appropriations are a "continued waste of public funds for political purposes," then Mr. Burton himself is responsible for a colossal looting of the Public Treasury.

The largest appropriation ever carried in a single bill was in that of 1907, amounting to $87,062,432, which Mr. Burton, as chairman of the committee, framed and fought for. This measure was passed by the House without any change, just as it came from his committee, and in an eloquent and convincing speech in its defense Mr. Burton—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 41, page 2028—said: "I wish to say to the House that, in my judgment, this is not only the largest river and harbor bill ever presented but it is the best."

Now, the pertinent fact to be noted is this: The bill of 1907, so highly praised by Mr. Burton, carried appropriations aggregating $4,379,603 for all the projects, with but three exceptions, which the Munsey article now criticizes so sharply. And these three excepted projects were not appropriated for because two of them had already been completed, and the third had not yet been adopted.

The following table shows the appropriations for the projects now caustically criticized by Mr. Burton. The first column shows the sums appropriated for each project in Mr. Burton's pet bill of 1907—"the largest and best" ever enacted—and the second contains the total amounts authorized for them during his chairmanship:

Appropriations made by Mr. Burton during his 10-year chairmanship of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors (1898–1909) for projects to which he now objects.

Projects now objected to by Mr. Burton.	Appropriations in act of 1907—Mr. Burton's "best."	Total appropriations in all acts from 1899–1909.
Colbert and Bee Tree Shoals (Tennessee River)	$413,000	$1,513,000
Big Sandy River	235,000	734,500
James River	200,000	850,000
Columbia and Willamette Rivers (below Portland)	300,000	900,000
Illinois and Mississippi Canal (Hennepin Canal)	.....	500,000
Sandy Bay Harbor of Refuge	200,000	850,000
Mississippi River (mouth of Ohio to mouth of Missouri River)	1,000,000	4,250,000
Brazos River (Waco to Washington, Tex.)	225,000	300,000
Ouachita River	561,603	1,257,369
Red River (below Fulton, Ark.)	150,000	525,000
Trinity River	375,000	943,287
Kentucky River	520,000	570,000
Coosa River	50,000	85,000
Missouri River (Kansas City to mouth)	150,000	(1)
Total appropriations	4,379,603	13,653,156

[1] About $375,000.

NOTE.—Other projects objected to were Cape Lookout, which was not adopted until 1912, and Muscle Shoals, which was completed in 1889.

A DILEMMA FOR MR. BURTON.

Now, one of two things is certain: Either Mr. Burton was sincere in his support of these projects, for which more than $13,600,000 was expended while he was chairman of the committee, as appears from the above table, and believed them to be right at that time, or he was weakly lending his support to the "waste of public funds for political purposes under the guise of improving our rivers and harbors." I can not believe the latter, for his whole career, up to the past three or four years, when the presidential bee began to buzz so loudly in his ears, shows him to have been a consistent advocate of wise business-like methods of conducting river and harbor improvements, and he is a man of so much force of character that he would never have yielded to anything which he did not approve.

The record of his career as chairman, and his speeches in the House of Representatives, all show that he was either silent in regard to these projects or that not only did he refrain from criticizing the items he now attacks but he strongly championed some of them, especially the Trinity River. In fact, the improvement of the Ouachita, Brazos, and Trinity Rivers, now targets for the shafts of Mr. Burton, was first undertaken and the initial appropriation for these rivers made while he was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. Hence he is doubly responsible for them. What moral or legal right has he now to speak in derogation of them? Is he not estopped by his actions? "He who was silent when he ought to have spoken will not be permitted to speak when he should be silent."

THE REAL TRUTH.

The space of this article prevents me from explaining all the projects which Mr. Burton criticizes, but I will show the real truth in regard to several of them.

A very striking feature of Mr. Burton's article is that he attempts to charge the commerce on various rivers, for a certain year, with the entire cost of the improvement of the river for that year, plus 4 per cent interest on every cent expended on the river from the beginning of the Government. This is manifestly unfair in the extreme. His system is one entirely of debit, without any credit. If it be proper to charge a stream with the total expenditure thereon since the Government began to make improvements then it should be credited with all the commerce carried thereon during all these years. He does not consider the colossal commerce which passed over these rivers in the early days and which far more than offset any sums for improvements at that time. Every dollar expended from year to year is carried forward by him into one sum and 4 per cent computed thereon. Why he adopts 4 per cent I do not know, for surely the Government can borrow money much cheaper than that.

One of the projects he singles out is the Red River in Louisiana and Arkansas, on which, since the beginning of the Government, there has been expended $2,763,806, by odds the greater portion of which was for annual maintenance, which should have been charged off against the commerce of each year. Yet Mr. Burton capitalizes the whole sum and computes 4 per cent interest thereon. What would be the result if all amounts expended, not only for the construction, and frequently the rebuilding, but also for the maintenance and operation of railroads, should be capitalized and the road required to earn a reasonable interest thereon? The mere statement suggests the unreasonableness of this proposition.

Red River had a very large commerce until recent years, when, with the completion of parallel railroads on each bank and cross roads at several important points, many boats were driven out by cutthroat rail competition. The commerce of 1913, cited by Mr. Burton, was the low-water mark, and showed only 26,166 tons, valued at $310,333. Why did he not, in all fairness, mention that of last year, 1914, which was 47,351 tons, valued at $2,939,073?

Mr. Burton also scores the Hennepin Canal and charges that its improvement was so much money thrown away.

The Hennepin Canal proper stops 100 miles from Chicago. When it was improved it was expected that the connecting link between its terminus and the city of Chicago would be placed in proper condition by the State of Illinois, but this was never done, and hence through traffic is impossible. A railroad stopping 100 miles from Chicago would carry little freight to that city, and the Hennepin Canal is exactly in this position. It is now probable that this connecting link will be improved by the State of Illinois, and, in my judgment, whenever boats of a size which can traverse the Hennepin Canal can go through this link there will be a development of traffic which will justify the building of the canal.

THE MISSOURI SETS THE PACE.

The great Missouri River, between Kansas City and its mouth, is also the object of Mr. Burton's adverse comment. This stretch of the river has during the past two months been exhaustively investigated by the seven members of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, who made a persoal examination of the river. Elaborate hearings were held and every fact connected with the improvement of the Missouri was unearthed. The board made a unanimous report, which is now before Congress, and which heartily indorses the continued improvement of this river. This report states that although the commerce on the Missouri is not large, this is because the channel is barely navigable in some places. This, of course, will be obviated when the project is completed.

The report sets forth that the freight traffic is growing rapidly; that the Kansas City Missouri River Navigation Co. is setting an unprecedented example in the way of inland water navigation; that this company is carrying freight under the same conditions as and in competition with the railroads, assuming all insurance risks, paying switching charges, giving through rates and regular schedules, and charging only 80 per cent of rail rate. To stop the improvement would be to nip this growing commerce in the bud and to deprive the people of that section of the benefits of cheap and efficient water transportation.

To read Mr. Burton's article one would think that inland water transportation in the United States is a relic of a prehistoric age. This is far from the truth, and in the aggregate a large volume of freight is carried by water. One of the very few completed waterway projects in the United States, which has been finished less than a year, is the Black Warrior-Tombigbee River, which connects the coal fields of Alabama with New Orleans and vicinity. Although this stream has been opened only a few months, it already has a large commerce, which has more than doubled in four months, and the charges on which are far below the railroad rates.

THE OHIO'S COLOSSAL COMMERCE.

It is probably a mere coincidence that the only one of the larger rivers of the country which Mr. Burton thinks "should have a thorough trial" is the Ohio. In view of the fact that the Ohio carries a commerce of from 9,000,000 to 12,000,000 tons a year, although only 15 of the 53 locks and dams required for the complete improvement of the river are finished, and although the depth over a considerable portion of the river for periods ranging from 2 to 11 months at a time is less than 3 feet, while the minimum depth which will be available when the work is completed is 9 feet, it certainly does not seem unreasonable that the Ohio River should be given a thorough trial. It is worthy of note that no plan for the complete improvement of the Ohio was adopted until after Mr. Burton had surrendered the chairmanship of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and that the filibusters conducted by him in 1914 and 1915 seriously delayed the completion of the Ohio River project, as well as every other waterway and harbor in the United States.

SPLENDID SYSTEM OF CHECKS AND BALANCES.

No bills that come before Congress are better safeguarded than those making appropriations for waterways, and it is almost impossible to put through an unworthy project. A brief statement follows of the steps preceding the adoption of a project; whether it be one of great general importance, costing millions, or some obscure river or inlet of only local interest, the process is the same.

A bill is introduced in the House or Senate asking a survey of the proposed project, and if thought worthy on prima facie showing the survey is included in the next river and harbor bill. The Chief of Engineers then directs the United States engineer in charge of the locality, usually an officer with the rank of captain or major, to make a preliminary examination and report, showing feasibility, prospective cost and benefits, and every ascertainable fact. This report goes first to the colonel in charge of the division, then to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, composed of seven United States engineers of high rank, and finally to the Chief of Engineers. If the local engineer reports adversely, that usualy settles it, and the matter is dropped, though occasionally he is overruled by his superiors. If the local engineer finds the project apparently worthy, he so reports, and his opinion, after most careful consideration by his superiors, is affirmed or disapproved.

Should the Chief of Engineers, in the light of all the facts and suggestions of the local engineer, the division engineer, and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors conclude that the project is worthy of an actual survey, it is ordered and referred back to the local engineer. A survey party is then placed in the field and an elaborate survey is made to ascertain every fact bearing upon the project, including cost, commerce—present and prospective—and everything helpful to Congress in reaching a final conclusion upon its merits and demerits. This survey usually requires several months and, in the very important projects, one or more years, and no reasonable expense is spared to get all the facts. The report then goes to the division engineer, who attaches his views and forwards it to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors.

This board has offices in the city of Washington, and in addition to a careful review of the reports of the local and division engineers, it gives hearings, pro and con, to interested persons. Moreover, if the project is a costly one, the board frequently examines it in person, as it did recently when the entire membership of seven colonels investigated the Missouri River below Kansas City. The findings of this board, accompanied by reports, evidence, maps, and so forth, then go to the Chief of Engineers, who renders a final decision, which is transmitted through the Secretary of War to Congress, and the whole record is published as a public document for all the world to see. And if the project is not regarded as worthy, either by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors or the Chief of Engineers, it is not considered as having legislative status. In other words, Congress will not appropriate for waterway projects unless approved as above indicated, except in very rare cases, when the amount involved is quite small and Congress has conducted an independent investigation for itself.

Bear in mind that the United States engineers are the honor men of West Point, the pick and flower of the American Army; that many of the ablest and best men of our Republic, including the builders of the Panama Canal, have been United States engineers; that they have disbursed over three-fourths of a billion dollars on waterways, with only one scandal—that at Savannah; that they hold office for life; that they are not interested personally in the localities where they serve for three or four years and then leave, never to return in most cases; and that not only 1 engineer, but 10, must investigate and report in writing for publication upon a waterway project before Congress will consider it.

How would it be possible for anything smelling of pork or graft to run such a gantlet? The charge of pork barrel is preposterous. It is made by enemies of waterway legislation who have no regard for truth.

Again I say, river and harbor bills are not pork-barrel bills, but commerce builders.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Provincetown, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation for the retirement of superannuated employees of the Postal Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of Allyn K. Dockham and sundry other citizens of Fitchburg, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to classify the salaries of employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibtion, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARREN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Northern California Counties Association, praying for the enactment of legislation to create the Lassen Volcanic National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 125, Cracker Packers' Union, of San Francisco, Cal., and a petition of the Chauffeurs' Union, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the printing of the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Jefferson Davis Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to veterans of the Confederate Army and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Catholic Federation of Santa Clara County, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to make October 12 a legal holiday, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Public Library of Prospect, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to fix a standard price for patented and trade-marked articles, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Litchfield County Automobile Club, of Winsted, Conn., praying for Federal aid in the construction of goods roads, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of New Haven and West Haven, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the King Street Christian Church, of Danbury, Conn., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the United Presbyterian Church, of Thompsonville, Conn., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the Christian Endeavor Union and of the congregation of the Main Street Baptist Church, of Meriden, Conn., praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which the subject was referred, reported a resolution (S. Res. 115) providing for the printing as a Senate document of the manuscript entitled "Report on Credit Organization for the Farmer and Tradesman in Northern France."

He also, from the same committee, to which the subject was referred, reported a resolution (S. Res. 116) to print as a Senate document the pamphlet entitled "The Duty of Courts to Refuse to Execute Statutes in Contravention of Fundamental Law."

He also, from the same committee, to which the subject was referred, reported a resolution (S. Res. 117) to print as a Senate document the manuscript entitled "Uniform State Laws Relating to Rural Credits and Land Registration."

ALFRED CLUFF AND OTHERS.

Mr. ASHURST. On January 5 I introduced a bill—Senate bill 2870—for the relief of Alfred Cluff, Orson Cluff, Henry E. Norton, William B. Ballard, Elijah Hancock, Susan R. Saline, Oscar Mann, Celia Thayne, William Cox, Theodore Farley, Adelaide Laxton, Clara L. Tenney, George M. Adams, Charlotte Jensen, and Sophia Huff, and had it referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that the bill, together with all papers and reports accompanying it, may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was unable to understand the request of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I will restate it. On January 5 I introduced Senate bill 2870, for the relief of certain persons, which bill was referred to the Committee on Claims. I now ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the bill, together with all papers and reports, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Claims, but I think the request should have been made when the chairman of that committee or some member was present. I have no objection at all to the request, but I simply make this statement, so that if there is any objection hereafter on the part of any member of the committee, it may be taken into consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be referred, together with the accompanying papers and reports, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 4836) for the relief of Daniel O'Connell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 4837) granting an increase of pension to Lawrence Over (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4838) granting a pension to Holmes R. Love (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4839) granting an increase of pension to Edward B. Clark (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

MAINTENANCE OF ROADS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a communication from Clarence J. Owens, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress, transmitting a copy of an address entitled "Road maintenance and its significance," delivered by Mr. E. W. James, chief of maintenance of the Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering, United States Department of Agriculture, before the Southern Commercial Congress at the seventh annual convention held at Charleston, S. C., December 17, 1915. I ask that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing relative to its being printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROPOSED CENTRAL POWER PLANT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have received a communication from Mr. Hennen Jennings, civil and mining engineer, relative to the suspension of the construction of a power plant on the water front facing the Potomac Park system and designated in the hearings held before the Committee on the Library, United States Senate, as a central heating, lighting, and power plant on the Mall. The communication is accompanied by tables and illustrations, and I ask that the entire matter be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am taking occasion even at this late hour under these adverse circumstances to present some remarks on what I regard as one of the most important subjects now before Congress or that will be before Congress. I am doing so because of the fact that some engagements of a public character will likely take me away for a while, and the bill which I refer to may possibly be presented and called up for action before I may be able to return.

The bill has been reported by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and is the bill (S. 2986) to provide capital for agricultural development, to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgage, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, on August 14, 1912, I first took occasion to submit some remarks on the general subject of rural credits. The effort primarily then was to have Congress adopt a resolution officially accrediting the American commission to be assembled later by the Southern Commercial Congress for the purpose of studying the various systems then in successful operation in certain European countries.

The commission was assembled, and in conjunction with the United States commission, created by Congress to cooperate in that undertaking, did make a tour of some 14 countries in Europe between April 26 and July 26, 1913, investigating the actual operations of the established systems intended to meet the needs of agriculture in a financial way, collecting data in connection therewith and studying the various laws and the working details. The result is shown in Senate Documents 214 and 261, Parts I and II, and the report of the United States commission to Congress, Senate Document No. 380, Parts I, II, and III.

Again, on August 9, 1912, I discussed the subject further in the Senate and introduced a bill on long-term mortgage credit, S. 2909. I believe this was the first bill presented to Congress intended to provide for a complete system of that kind in the interest of the agricultural industry of the country.

Later the report of the United States commission was submitted to Congress, including a bill, S. 4246, agreed on by that commission, embracing some of the essential features of S. 2909, and making some additions and modifications of the detailed plan.

On August 26, 1913, I made report to the house of governors at Colorado Springs, as chairman of the American commission, giving an account of the work in Europe and setting forth some of the conclusions reached. The house of governors approved the work and generally indorsed the plan proposed.

Since August, 1913, some 60 bills have been introduced in Congress on the subject.

A joint committee selected from the standing Committees on Banking and Currency of the Senate and House, to whom was referred the bills theretofore introduced, considered the subject in the light of the report of the two commissions and the material collected, and agreed on a bill known as the Hollis-Bulkley bill, which included the essential features of S. 2909 and the commission bill, S. 4246.

The Agricultural appropriation bill of 1915 created a specific joint committee, composed of members of the standing Committees on Banking and Currency and Agriculture of the two Houses, charged with the duty of considering all proposals theretofore made, and the whole subject, with instructions to report a bill by January 1, 1916.

This joint committee did make report (H. Doc. 494), and submitted a bill (H. R. 6838, Jan. 4, 1916; S. 2986, Jan. 5, 1916), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and was favorably reported, with amendments, January 15, 1916, report No. 144.

This is the measure now on the calendar for action. Reference has been made to what was said heretofore, because I prefer not to cover the same ground or repeat the argument at this time. Those who feel sufficient interest can examine the previous discussion of the subject, where, with some elaboration, the reasons for this legislation and its need were pointed out.

Those reasons, I have every reason to believe, exist with equal if not increased force to-day and throughout the country are better understood. The more the people have examined the question the more they realize the soundness of those reasons and the more pronounced and widespread their conviction that response should be made by legislative action along the lines set forth in this bill. The need grows as time passes and its realization has appeared boldly as light has been thrown on the situation in which our farmers find themselves.

In a more or less listless, not to say indifferent, way those engaged in agricultural pursuits have in the past simply accepted conditions under the impression that no way of bettering them existed.

They have not exerted themselves with sufficient energy to find the means of correcting the difficulties or of obtaining relief from the burdens under which they struggled, and no sufficient interest was taken outside their vocation to solve the problem or point the way, while selfish complacency of those who profited by a continuance of the status quo discouraged any hope of a change. The farmer is naturally and generally conservative. He does not readily turn to new proposals. He must be convinced, not only that the purposes and motives of those who would change the old order of things even for his benefit are pure, but that the change would be workable and efficacious and accomplish the results claimed. He takes time to consider and reflect upon and examine the proposals from all sides. He must be got to catch the vision as it has come to others in all its fullness and force. When he reaches this stage he is ready for action, and when he gets ready he is impatient of delay.

Nearly four years ago this subject was brought to the attention of the farmers of this country. It took the shape of pledges in the platforms of the political parties adopted in national conventions. They were urged to investigate and study the question to the end that they might be satisfied of the soundness of the view that the industry, if not actually discriminated against, was not receiving in our financial system the treatment to which it was entitled and the correction of that was entirely feasible—that not only was it feasible to devise a plan by which the greatest industry in the country could be properly served, but unless that was done we had reached a stage where the industry had begun to languish, and that meant increasing discouragement to those engaged in it, less remuneration and added hardships, a wasting of the soil, decreasing production, higher cost of living, and, eventually, national weakness.

There was small difficulty in showing the need for the establishment of a system, supplementary to our financial scheme, that would bring relief. The harder task was to determine upon the precise nature of that system and the ways and means of putting it into operation. A close study of the systems in successful practice in the older countries, where it was found necessary half a century, at least, ago, to solve this very problem, could not fail to throw a blaze of light on the subject. The experience of those countries, where agriculture has attained its highest development, must surely furnish a trustworthy guide. Our problem began to narrow down to one of adaptation of true and tried principles rather than one of experimentation with original theories. We found certain principles had worked most successfully for over 50 years, for the redemption of agriculture, and it would be the height of folly to ignore the lessons thus taught. All we had to do was to adapt those principles to conditions in the United States—shape our law so as to make the application of those well-tried principles to conditions here plain, practical, and effective.

The best thought of two commissions; the serious, painstaking studies of two joint committees; the earnest consideration of two standing committees of Congress; the careful examination and interchange of views by the governors of the States; the deep interest and investigation of the farmers of the country; the patriotic concern and conscientious efforts of public-spirited citizens, anxious to promote a sound agriculture—all these have contributed toward reaching a wise conclusion as to the precise language which should be employed in placing on the statute book the law that would accomplish the results all should solemnly and keenly desire.

Such a measure is now before us. We should not delay an unforgiving minute in passing it. It may not be absolutely perfect. It is one thing to know what is wanted and it is a somewhat different thing to express in terms of a statute what is in the mind. When it goes into effect, as I sincerely hope it will very soon, it is possible we may find occasion for amendments which would improve it. It will not immediately transform conditions into the ideal. Its promised benefits, vast in extent and permanent in character, I am convinced will be realized, but they will be largely a matter of continuous, perhaps at first apparently slow, growth.

Patience must be exercised and disappointment checked until the plan is in full operation, and all the machinery of administration shall be in complete running order.

One of the first effect will be to reduce the charges, expenses, commissions, and interest, now borne by the farmers of the country on loans, about one-half. This will save to them an annual outlay of some $200,000,000.

No industry of the country has ever stood or could have stood the enormous burdens of this kind that agriculture has been obliged to bear during all the years of the past.

In the report of the committee a table is furnished to show the rate of interest charged on farm-mortgage loans in the various States. I am thoroughly satisfied it is given much lower than that actually paid.

In Florida, for instance, the average interest rate is given at 9 per cent, and the commission is given at one-half of 1 per cent. Not long ago, I made certain inquiries of the Commissioner of Agriculture of Florida, and some of them related to this item. I desire to insert as a part of my remarks his reply, to wit:

THE STATE OF FLORIDA,
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Tallahassee, December 17, 1915.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 26th ultimo has been duly received, and the information is herewith supplied as nearly correctly as it is possible to obtain it.

We regret that our reply has been delayed, though the delay has been unavoidable, and we trust that it has not inconvenienced you appreciably.

The information contained in the first seven questions of your letter had to be obtained from various sources, and covers what might be termed the present conditions as they exist in various sections of the State to-day. Question 6, however, belongs really to a different section of your letter, and that has to be obtained through census returns.

As we presume you have kept a copy of your letter for reference, we will endeavor to reply to the various questions in accordance with the numbers of the questions:

1. What amount of money is loaned to farmers on time—say, two to five years—in Florida?

Answer. Can not say; amount so small that it might be considered as a part of loans in general.

2. What would be the average rate of interest on such loans, commissions, abstracts, fees, etc., making total cost to borrower?

Answer. We estimate it at 12 per cent.

3. What amount is loaned to farmers by banks and individuals on short time—say, 90 days to one year—and at what rate, fees, commissions, etc., making total cost to borrower?

Answer. About 90 per cent. These papers are either indorsed personally or secured by collateral, or both. Notes and mortgages and the rate of interest will average more than 10 per cent.

4. What amount in cost of supplies is furnished farmers on credit, including fertilizers, machinery, etc., annually?

Answer. Fully 66⅔ per cent to 75 per cent of all amounts purchased.

5. What is difference in price to farmers between cash and credit for these?

Answer. From 8 per cent to 25 per cent.

6. Rate of interest and cost to the borrower, average?

Answer. Varies from 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

The following questions are made up from the United States census of 1910:

7. Give the number of farms mortgaged in Florida. Give the number of farms not mortgaged?

Answer. Farms mortgaged by owners, 5,160. Percentage of farms mortgaged 14.8 per cent. Farms not mortgaged, 44,856. In Illinois 55,792 farms were mortgaged by owners and the percentage of farms mortgaged was 39.2. Farms not mortgaged, 196,080.

8. Number of tenants on farms?

Answer. Number of tenants on farms in Florida, 110,000, or 26.7 per cent.

9. Number of occupying owners on farms?

Answer. Number of occupying owners and managers on farms, 325,155, or 73.3 per cent.

10. Proportion of tenants compared to owners occupying and cultivating their own farms, and what has been the increase or decrease during the last 10 years?

Answer. Twenty-five per cent tenants; 75 per cent owners and managers. Decrease in tenants about 1.7. Corresponding increase in owners and managers.

11. Can you give the per capita wealth of farmers in Florida and compare that with the same in Illinois?

Answer. Per capita wealth of farmers in Florida, $268.20; in Illinois, $180.70.

12. Give the production per acre in value in Florida, in Illinois?

Answer. Production per acre in Florida, $29.60; in Illinois, $18.30.

The following are additional items of information in connection with the above from the census of 1910, which makes, in our opinion, clearer the statements made above. They also help to show Florida to greater advantage.

13. Total number of all farmers in Florida, 533,539; an increase in number of 32.6 per cent. In Illinois there were 2,161,662 farmers, showing an increase of 3 per cent over the previous census.

14. Value of all farm property in Florida, $148,183,183; in Illinois it was $3,905,321,075.

15. Value per acre of land in Florida was $27.25; in Illinois, $120.80.

16. Percentage of increase in value in Florida, $120.50; in Illinois, $96.50.

17. The whole number of farms in Florida, 50,016; in Illinois, 251,872.

18. Percentage of increase in number of farms in Florida, 22.5 per cent; in Illinois, 4.6 per cent.

19. Percentage of increase in value of all farm property in Florida, 165.5 per cent; in Illinois, 94.8 per cent.

The following information is based on the same rate of increase as obtains in the census of 1910, but is for the five years from 1910 to the present time.

We are taking the liberty of giving you this information as additional evidence of the rapid progress being made by Florida. We are repeating many of the same questions as are contained in the above so as to show the contrast:

1. According to the State census just completed the total number of farmers in Florida is 614,469, or 66.6 per cent increase in five years.
2. Number of tenants on farms, 153,617, or 25 per cent.
3. Number of occupying owners and managers of farms, 460,852, or 75 per cent.
4. Number of all farms in Florida, 61,019, an increase in five years of 22 per cent.
5. Number of farms mortgaged, 8,543.
6. Number of farms not mortgaged and operated by owners and managers, 52,467.
7. Value of all farm property in Florida, $261,595,677, an increase in value in five years of 82.7 per cent.
8. Value per acre of farms, $45.50, an increase of $18.25.
9. Per capita wealth of all farmers in Florida, $425.70.
10. Acreage cultivated, 1,294,847.
11. Value of products per acre, including all kinds of crops, $35.10.

12. (Which corresponds with No. 15 in your letter regarding demonstration work.) The amount expended by the State for all purposes connected with agriculture is about $10,000 per year, but this does not include any of the appropriations of the National Government—we mean principally the Lever bill—nor do we include the appropriations made for the State experiment stations and branches.

The two questions 13 and 14 in your letter can not be answered by this department. We have time and again made effort to get this information, but have never been able to do so. We can only suggest that it might be possible for you to obtain this information through the Interstate Commerce Commission. If that commission can not supply it, we do not know how it can be obtained, even approximately.

Trusting that what we have gotten together may be of some real service to you, and regretting any delay that may have been occasioned, I am, with best regards,

Yours, very truly,
W. A. MCRAE,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

The rate of interest and amount of commissions in other States are mentioned in this statement, appearing in the report on this bill. My correspondence would indicate a considerably higher average than that given.

Let me here quote from an address delivered by Hon. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, October 6 last. This comes ex cathedra and is no mere estimate. It is entitled to weight accordingly. Speaking of interest exactions by banks, he says:

Naturally, the highest and most startling rates have been charged in portions of the West and South, where money is known to be scarcest, but the records show more or less numerous instances in the East and North and the Northwest where the hand of the spoiler has also been active.

One thousand and twenty-two banks in different sections of the country, out of the total of 7,615 banks, admitted that they were receiving an average of 10 per cent or more—some an average of 18 per cent—on all their loans.

Those receiving an average of 10 per cent and upward included 2 banks in Illinois, 6 in Minnesota, 2 in Missouri, 23 in Georgia, 6 in Florida; 1 in Alabama, 2 in Louisiana, 317 in Texas, 17 in Arkansas, 3 in Tennessee, 90 in North Dakota, 25 in South Dakota, 18 in Nebraska, 5 in Kansas, 38 in Montana, 14 in Wyoming, 37 in Colorado, 25 in New Mexico, 300 in Oklahoma, 12 in Washington, 10 in Oregon, 13 in California, 2 in Utah, 1 in Nevada, and 33 banks in Idaho.

The statistics tell us that in large sections of this country the farmer—the very foundation of our commerce, the inspiration of our enterprise, the greatest producer and the greatest consumer—instead of being the most settled and firmly established member of the community has become almost the most migratory and unstable of our citizens. The census figures gives us good ground for believing that the farmer, in many sections of the country, has been driven from his home from year to year by the rapacity of the unscrupulous money lender, who charges him for the use of money for one year as much as he ought to pay for its use for 10 or 15 years. He endures and pays as long as he can and then sells his live stock and disposes of such other property as he may have—or lets the sheriff dispose of it—and moves on to start life anew.

The money lender collects his principal as well as his extortionate interest, for I am informed that the farmers' paper nearly always is paid, however great a sacrifice the farmer may have to make to meet these obligations.

He further says:

The list shows that there were a total of 1,206 banks charging 12 per cent or more, of which 9 were in New York State, 6 in Pennsylvania, 2 in Maine, 3 in Massachusetts, 5 in Virginia, 7 in West Virginia, 6 each in Florida and Louisiana, 66 in Georgia, 62 in Alabama, 168 in Texas, 7 in Arkansas, 17 in Kentucky, 28 in Tennessee, 4 in Ohio, 8 in Indiana, 40 in Illinois, 7 in Iowa, 19 in Missouri, 69 in North Dakota, 48 in South Dakota, 21 in Kansas, 46 in Montana, 20 in Wyoming, 63 in Colorado, 33 in New Mexico, 287 in Oklahoma, 25 in Washington, 30 in California, 45 in Idaho, 18 in Utah, and 8 in Nevada; 3 each in Michigan, Oregon, North Carolina, and Arizona. In New Jersey, District of Columbia, Nebraska, Minnesota, and South Carolina only 2 banks in each reported 12 per cent or higher and only 1 in Maryland.

The banks in Mississippi, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, and Wisconsin denied having charged as much as 12 per cent on any loan since June 23, 1915.

In Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Montana, Colorado, California, and Nevada high rates may, under the law, be charged in special contracts. The only other States in which, even by contract, a rate as high as 12 per cent is permitted are Pennsylvania, the Dakotas, Idaho, New Mexico, Washington, Wyoming, and Utah, and wherever in these States rates in excess of 12 per cent are charged they are usurious.

The 771 banks in the 27 remaining States were charging 12 per cent and upward in defiance of the usury laws of their respective States.

I am pleased to note the comptroller recommends a system of rural credits in these words:

A well-thought-out, carefully constructed, conservative system of rural credits for the development of agriculture and the increase of our wealth and resources by offering encouragement and opportunity to the ambitious farmer will come presently. When it comes all of us will share the splendid results.

But not the least difficulty at present is that farmers in various portions of the country are unable to obtain for improvements and for development of their business any loans at all. The national banks, although the Federal reserve act—in that respect changing the law which prohibited them from making loans on real estate, thus striking down the chief asset of the farmer as security for loans, under the only financial system we had—now authorizes them to loan on farm lands, are making no such loans, for the very reason they can employ their funds to better advantage by turning them over in commercial transactions.

Farm lands, under our laws establishing our financial system in 1864, have been discredited as security. Besides, commercial banks are not in position to tie up their funds in time loans. Hence it is that no commercial system can meet the needs of the farmers of the country, and even as amended by the Federal reserve act our banking system is purely a commercial system. It serves those engaged in commerce, manufacturing, and enterprises other than agriculture. Hence the necessity of supplying a system supplementary to our commercial system by which this fundamental, necessary industry can be reasonably served.

The next effect will be to correct the dangerous tendency of to-day toward an increase in tenants on the farms and a diminution of occupying owners. The facilities for acquiring a home will be provided for those now tenants and for those desirous of making agriculture their business in life.

The next effect will be skilled farmers throughout the land will be enabled to enlarge their operations, increase their net earnings, develop their property, make permanent improvements, beautify their homes, and better the conditions of and make more attractive country life.

By obtaining financial accommodations for such purposes, on such terms as will then be available to them, the transaction will become an investment rather than the creation of a debt.

Outside, permanent capital will be attracted and devoted to productive uses in communities where fresh capital is needed. The securities will be so guarded and protected as to make them absolutely safe. This will induce a low interest rate. The holder of the bond has no relations with the mortgagors. He looks to the bank issuing the bond. His coupons will be sent through his local bank for collection, and finally the bond itself, just as checks or drafts are handled and credited.

The fact that the investment will be safe and will remain for a period of years without further trouble or loss of interest caused by changing loans will favorably impress those who have fixed capital from which they wish to derive an income. The bonds will have back of them: (a) The personal obligation of the borrower; (b) the real estate mortgaged, carefully appraised to be worth twice the amount of the loan; (c) the indorsement of the local association or agent of the Federal land bank; (d) the capital—not less than $500,000—and surplus of the Federal land bank; (e) the guaranty of all the Federal land banks (12); (f) the approval of the bond issue by the Federal Farm Loan Board; (g) the protection of Government supervision similar to that of the national banks; (h) the amortization payments which the borrower is obliged to make at every interest-paying period, thereby increasing the security, or rather diminishing the debt, constantly toward the vanishing point.

It is important to make the market as certain and extensive for these bonds as possible in order that the borrowers may reap the full advantages of the undoubted security behind them. To further promote that, the bonds and the mortgages will be exempt from taxation.

It is well understood that if the bonds and mortgages are to be taxed the amount thereof will be reflected in the interest they must be made to bear.

It is therefore essential that, in order that the borrowers may get the benefit of the lowest possible rate of interest, the mortgages and the bonds must be made exempt from taxation.

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

As to the constitutionality of the provision for tax exemption and all other provisions of the bill I have no question.

The encouragement of agriculture may be stated as a broad, general purpose of the proposed measure.

Congress is just as fully authorized to create a system whereby those engaged in that industry can properly finance their operations as it can create the Department of Agriculture itself.

Certainly legislation of this character, intended to accomplish such a purpose, is not more open to objection on constitutional grounds than are the various acts of Congress respecting the work of that department.

Again, Congress has power to create a system supplemental to our commercial banking system, which we may designate as a rural financial system, just as complete as in the case of commercial banking. This may be implied from the first and last paragraphs of section 8 in Article I of the Constitution.

It is made clearer by the decision in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316). This opinion, often cited, discusses very fully the powers of Congress in matters of this kind. I can see no real distinction between the power of Congress in the creation of the bank discussed in that opinion and its power in the creation of the suggested Federal land banks.

See also note to section 5133, volume 5, page 79, Federal Statutes Annotated.

On the same subject may be cited Talbott v. Silver Bow Co., Commissioners (139 U. S., 438); Owensboro National Bank v. Owensboro (173 U. S., 664); also Federal Statutes Annotated, volume 5, page 157, note to section 5219.

This argument might be applied to the various features of the bill, including stock subscription by the Government, fiscal agency, depositing of public funds, embracing postal savings and others, and extended to great length, but it would seem unnecessary to dwell on that feature unless serious contention is urged that there would be doubt as to the constitutionality of the legislation.

Mr. President, permit me to quote from a few of the many letters I have received from various portions of the country by way of indicating the demand for this legislation. I ask leave to include these extracts in my remarks.

Extract from letter of F. T. Lockhart, Parkersburg, W. Va., under date of November 18, 1915:

I have noticed in the papers that you are interested in the rural-credit law, and I am also, and having given the matter much attention, I beg to inclose you my ideas of what that law should be. * * * I hope Congress may see its way clear to pass this law, for I know the farmers need it, and for the further reason it will not cost the Government one cent to do so, and it will assist the farmers so much.

Extract from letter of Mr. R. W. Winston, of Raleigh, N. C., under date of October 23, 1914:

I believe if Congress will turn its attention to agriculture the wealth of our country will be vastly increased, and that the stability of our Government will be preserved.

Extract from letter of L. L. Sutton, Bushnell, Fla.:

I own and operate a very good farm near Bushnell, and, as a farmer, I feel the need of some kind of a system that will place the farmer where he can get money to develop and carry on his business at a less rate of interest and give him longer time to pay his loans.

Extract from letter of W. C. Brown, of 5056 Woodlawn Avenue, Chicago, Ill., under date of November 21, 1914:

Will you kindly have sent to me at the above address one dozen copies of Senate Document No. 380, Parts 1 and 2. * * * The report seems to me to be an admirable one, and the legislation suggested will, in my opinion, be one of the most beneficial and far-reaching pieces of constructive legislature in the history of the Government.

Extract from letter of G. R. Gant, of Webster, Fla., under date of November 27, 1914:

We farmers are looking to you for relief. We must have it.

Extract from communication of Adolph Hinkelman, secretary-treasurer Idaho County Union of the Farmers' Education and Cooperative Union of America, Greencreek, Idaho, under date of December 24, 1915:

My organization, however, the 28th day of March, 1914, has adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the greatest menace to the American farmer of to-day is the exorbitant, unfair rate of interest which he is charged for money necessary to carry on his business; and believing that this can be remedied only by cooperative methods of borrowing: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we are heartily in sympathy with the effort being put forth at Washington to establish a rural-credit system, and we hereby direct our secretary to communicate with our Representatives in Congress to use their influence in getting such a law enacted."

My organization will hold their annual convention the 22d day of January, 1916, and it is very likely they will again pass on this matter.

Extract from communication of Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary the Society to Lower Rents and Reduce Taxes on Homes, 320 Broadway, New York City, under date of December 3, 1915:

The commendable effort of the President and of your commission to better the financial and economic status of the farmers deserves heartiest support.

Extract from letter of John Sprunt Hill, of Durham, N. C., under date of November 26, 1915:

I hope now * * * that the whole matter can be so arranged that the Senator from Florida will be able to bring forth a bill along the lines advocated in your recent interview, which will meet the situation in the great Southland and prove one of the greatest blessings ever brought to the doors of our people.

The following letter, under date of December 4, 1916, was received from Greenville, Fla., bearing the signatures of the following farmers: E. W. Beasty, M. S. Clark, Owen Glenn, J. E. Shepard, S. J. Clark, W. F. Proctor, B. E. Chester, W. H. Woodland, W. B. Shepard, Rev. S. A. McLeand, J. N. Earnest, Simon P. Garner, and E. W. Beasly:

I am still expecting you to support rural credits and to use your influence to have enacted into law the rural-credits measure indorsed by the Farmers' Union, the American Society of Equity, and the Southern Commercial Congress.

Letter from Pine Grove Local Union, No. 397, Farmers' Education and Cooperative Union of America, under date of December 4, 1915:

President Wilson and Congress have promised the American farmers a rural-credits measure. We are expecting you to support the best rural-credits measure brought before Congress and see that it becomes law at once.

Extract from letter of F. C. Neel, Cornelia, Ga., under date of January 13, 1916:

First let me say that, in my judgment, no measure is more important to the vital interests of our rural population. In Georgia two-thirds of the farmers are tenants, who must remain tenants until by some means they may escape the supply merchant and the landlord. * * * A failure to enact a practical rural-credits law will be fatal to the Democratic Party at the next election, while I believe in its previous enactments it has done more to help the average man than any other administration. May I add that land is the best basis of value, because the prosperity and wealth of a country depend upon agriculture?

Extract from letter of Charles E. Christ, Sleepy Hollow Farm, Cabery, Ill., under date of January 12, 1916:

Your letter of October 20, 1915, with inclosure, received. In reply will say we would favor very much any legislation that would bring about such a system of rural credits and marketing organization.

As money is taxed about half of its income in Illinois, a large number of loans are kept secret, thus withholding considerable aid to such a system if it were adopted. A uniform and revised tax on money throughout the United States is needed very much.

Extract from communication of Mr. James H. Parrish, of Gainesville, Fla., under date of August 26, 1915:

I am glad to know you think Congress will enact a law making rural credits supplementary to our present banking system. From my viewpoint our present excellent system has hampered rather than helped our farmers by raising the standard of paper to meet the approval of regional banks. Before the farmer only had to get the approval of his local bankers, but now the cry is that our paper must be liquid assets.

Extract from letter of Mrs. M. S. Potter, Van Landt, W. Va., under date of August 12, 1915:

I have looked over the pamphlet on marketing organization and rural-credits system. * * * Hoping to see some such measure taken in this matter, etc.

Extract from letter of Mr. P. A. L. Ferguson, Minneapolis, Minn., under date of July 19, 1915:

I can scarcely think of any legislation that would contribute a greater impetus to the development of unimproved lands and agricultural industry in general than the establishment of a system of financing that will enable all farmers, rich and poor alike, to procure money at a low rate of interest for the conduct of farm business.

Extract from letter of Holmes Conrad, jr., of Cleveland, Ohio, under date of March 23, 1915:

For some years I studied the German Landschaften and feel that the adoption of some similar system in this country will be of incalculable benefit to the American farmer.

Extract from letter of J. M. Wells, of Little Rock, Ark., under date of April 16, 1915:

I certainly hope to see you succeed in the passage of the Moss-Fletcher bill now pending in Congress. It is the most needful legislation of the day. The farmers of the United States are in the hole, put there by the banks and speculators. They are the very rock and foundation upon which we all exist. They are entitled to very quick consideration from Congress. They are not asking Congress to give them anything. Only give them a credit system such as they are entitled to, and then they will work out their own salvation.

Extract from letter of A. O. Murphey, Little Rock, Ark., under date of December 7, 1915:

I am very much interested in some national legislation that will give the agricultural interests of our Nation banking facilities equal to those enjoyed by other interests. * * * And until the National Government recognizes agriculture upon the same basis as any other interests of our Nation the wonderful resources of the South will never be developed as they should. We want landowners and not land tenants, and this class will never become landowners under an interest rate of 15 to 20 per cent, and that, too, upon short-term loans.

Extract from letter of Charles W. Barrick, New Martinsville, W. Va., under date of December 31, 1915:

Your valued favor of the 28th instant received, together with bill S. 1106, for which please accept my thanks. You have an admirable bill, and I hope it may become a law. * * * With your bill and incontestable mortgages and titles and Government supervision unlimited success is sure.

Extract from letter of Lycurgus Burns, Winterhaven, Fla., under date of November 29, 1915:

The rural credits and marketing are two vital factors in getting for the farmer his just dues to enable him to get his share of the profits of his business and make it possible to enjoy the financial success necessary to make the farm attractive and keep the boy on the farm. * * * If there is anything necessary to insure the success of the farmer, it is marketing conditions that will get the products to the consumer at reasonable prices and give the man who grows the produce his share of the price the consumer pays.

Extract from letter of H. R. Mosnat, of Lake Hamilton, Polk County, Fla., under date of December 28, 1915:

I notice that the rural-credits matter is making steady and rapid progress at last. The newspapers stated a few days ago that the bill is almost ready and will be introduced early when Congress reassembles after the holidays. It will be a great help, I am sure.

Letter from J. R. Gant, of Webster, Fla., under date of December 11, 1914:

Please hurry up and get your rural credit banks or farm loan banks in operation. We thought the reserve banks would help us—we need assistance. There is not one farmer in ten here that can finance for next year's crop. I never saw such a time. No money to buy seed, fertilizer, or pay for labor. Let us have assistance.

Extract of letter from S. F. Hardin, of Chipley, Fla., under date of January 27, 1915:

The laws have helped everybody and everything but the farmer. Yes, the farmer. He has had no help. We certainly hope you will get busy in our behalf now.

Extract from letter of J. H. Stoltzfus, Tuleta, Tex.:

The farmers in States where the interest charges are from 8 to 12 per cent can see no logical reason for the delay in the passage of this bill, as it was presented last year. Am anxious to see it in its revised and corrected form.

Extract from letter of James Harrison, Micanopy, Fla., under date of January 30, 1915:

We do hope and pray that the present session of Congress will pass some form of law which will enable the farmers of the South to borrow money from the national banks on long time at a low rate of interest with farm property as security.

Letter from J. C. Carson:

OCEAN VIEW, OREG., December 20, 1915.

Mr. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

It occurs to me that the Landschaft system would be all right if made a national institution. Something of the kind must be done. I am paying 9 per cent on $1,000, secured by my 160 acres, as many other farmers are doing because they can't do better. Wishing you success in the movement, I am,

Yours, truly, J. C. CARSON.

Extract from letter of H. R. Mosnat, of Lake Hamilton, Polk County, Fla., under date of February 5, 1916:

I trust that the bill is making good progress and that it will soon be passed.

Extract from letter of William N. Mebane, proprietor of Kenton Stock Farm, Dublin, Va., under date of December 23, 1915:

We need a bill enabling a farmer to borrow money on long time at a low rate of interest. Now, we have to pay 6 per cent interest annually with 2 per cent additional brokerage for five years plus much additional expense for examination of titles, etc., making an additional expense of $25 or $50. We need the Torrens system badly, and the same provisions for borrowing money for 10 to 20 years at a low rate of interest—say for 3 to 6 per cent. Can we not get some such bill as that through Congress?

Extract from communication of O. M. Tillis, of Havana, Fla., under date of February 9, 1916:

As I see it the farmers in the agricultural counties of this State are in dire need of some legislation that will enable them to borrow money at a nominal rate of interest, say 6 per cent, and they now pay from 12 to 20 if they have chattel mortgage collateral, and can not borrow at all on their land.

Extract from communication of Col. I. E. Barwick, Palmetto, Fla., R. F. D. No. 1, under date of January 15, 1916:

Your first proposed bill came much nearer fulfilling requirements of the American farmer, especially southern farmers. Why walk before crawling? The great majority of poor southern farmers to-day are in bondage to supply stores and other capitalistic and speculative agencies and are living from hand to mouth at the will of such agencies. How can the one-horse cotton farmer diversify so long as the supply store says he must plant a money crop—cotton? How can we poor devils in Florida plant other than such vegetables exclusively as the northern merchants dictate, and to whom we are already in debt and must depend on for our daily bread and to whom we must each season turn over our crops to return results of sales as may suit him?

Extract from communication of F. C. Neel, Cornelia, Ga., under date of January 13, 1916:

Knowing that you are interested in the bill before Congress relating to rural credits, I venture to write you in regard to the same. First, let me say that, in my judgment, no measure is more important to the vital interest of our rural population. In Georgia two-thirds of our farmers are tenants, who must remain tenants until by some means they may escape the supply merchant and the landlord. Space and your time forbid that I elaborate this feature of the situation, with which you are probably familiar.

Extract from communication of Charles E. Christ, of Cabery, Ill., under date of January 12, 1916:

We would favor very much any legislation that would bring about such a system of rural credits and marketing organization.

As money is taxed about half of its income in Illinois, a large number of loans are kept secret, thus withholding considerable aid to such a system if it were adopted.

Mr. President, no finer thing can be done by any man or set of men than to articulate in a workable measure this demand. No greater service can be rendered by any man or set of men than to interpret this demand in terms of law adequately covering the subject.

There are no more important problems pressing for solution than those which have to do with agriculture and agricultural products.

TWO IMPORTANT ECONOMIC PROBLEMS RESPECTING THE PRIME NECESSITIES OF LIFE.

The prime necessities of life we may designate as food and clothing. The raw materials for these are obtained by the labor and intelligence of those who devote their lives to producing them. It must be a great satisfaction to feel that as a result of one's energies things worth while are created, things which one's fellow man needs are produced, things are made to grow, develop, and mature which are necessary to the existence of man and beast.

The people who do this live nearest the fountain of life in the divine economy, and ought to be encouraged rather than discouraged by laws and by every other means which may be properly employed. The lives of those who never produce anything, who are dependent on the energies of others, who are simply consumers, are nearly empty as compared to those creators of the countryside.

The occupation of the producer of a nation's foodstuff ought to be regarded as a rare privilege. Its satisfactions should be commensurate with its importance. Intelligence of a high order, good judgment, executive ability, persistent industry, and capacity for growth are the characteristics of the genuine and successful farmer.

It is not an easy, care-free life, and he does not ask that it be so. It is a most useful life and ought not to be embarrassed by hard conditions imposed for the benefit of others. It is supposed to be and ought to be an independent life, but, generally speaking, it has become quite otherwise. It offers a modest profit and a wholesome living to conservative people engaged in a permanent, conservative business.

There are difficulties to be overcome and chances to be taken at every stage from the preparation of the ground to the disposition of the crop. The general impression that the producer requires no capital is entirely erroneous. It is the lack of capital, or, when obtainable, the onerous terms exacted of him, that constitute his chief handicap. He must wait on the seasons to prepare and to cultivate the land. If it rains too much or too little he is injured. After his crop matures storms may destroy it. His cattle may be attacked by foot-and-mouth disease, his hogs by cholera, his fruit trees by rust, blight, scale, insects, white fly, citrus canker, or other pests. He has to fight diseases of horses, sheep, poultry, and enemies of everything that grows. Nothing he can plant or produce or raise but has its destroyer in waiting. Not only great diligence and ceaseless labor are required, but some capital is necessary. He overcomes all obstacles, but it is no easy task or one free from expense. Dean Hunt, of the University of California, says, "American farms must be recapitalized at least three times in a century."

After he has grown his crops the surplus goes to market, and if, for one reason and another, the returns yield him nothing of consequence, he is likely to feel that all his exertions have been in vain and his sons and daughters begin to look toward the cities and for other fields of endeavor. A little reflection will show what a failure of the crops for one year means to a country. Experience of other countries furnish numerous instances of famine and ruin. Imagine what would be the consequence if our farms were untilled or our crops fail but for one year.

Nothing more need be said to emphasize the importance of doing whatever we properly may to keep in prosperous condition our agricultural interests and in good spirits those who produce our foodstuff. The truth is, that nation which produces a surplus of the prime necessities of life which other nations must have or go hungry and unclothed is in position of supreme power.

The United States is in that position in large measure and can be completely so. We must maintain that position "without compromise and at any cost." To do this we must solve two problems:

First. What will increase production?

Second. What is the best possible plan of distribution?

There are various factors entering into these problems, but we are now dealing with what I conceive to be the one chief factor in each case, not yet given attention, which, when worked out and put in operation, will afford a solution, with what is being done respecting the other factors, of both of these problems.

Our Department of Agriculture has done and is doing invaluable work of the most beneficial and scientific kind in promoting production and in helping to equip the farmer with the proper weapons with which to wage the battle against the enemies and obstacles heretofore referred to.

OUR EXISTING FINANCIAL SYSTEM.

The Federal reserve act removed that express discrimination against the farmer in our only financial system—the prohibition against loan on farm land by national banks. But the reserve act created a coordinate system of banking and established for the use and protection of banks already in existence 12 additional banks, but so far as the public is concerned, it does not provide any new banks of deposit or discount.

Our financial system, even as revolutionized by the Federal reserve act, merely embraces commercial transactions. In section 24 it provides, however, that any national banking association, not situated in a central-reserve city, may make loans on farm lands, improved and unincumbered, not for a longer time than five years, in an aggregate sum not exceeding 25 per cent of its capital and surplus, or one-third of its time deposits.

If every national banking association so authorized took advantage of this privilege there would only be available for farm loans not exceeding $450,000,000 for the entire country, whereas the outstanding farm mortgages now amount to over two billion dollars. The fact is, however, that national banks will do nothing of the sort. They will not tie up their funds in fixed loans for five years or one year when they can turn these funds over every 90 days in commercial business to much better advantage to themselves.

To be sure, there is provision for discount, in section 13, by Federal reserve banks, upon indorsement of a member bank, of notes, drafts, bills of exchange, issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used or are to be used for such purposes.

Such notes, drafts, and bills, "drawn or issued for agricultural purposes or based on live stock and having a maturity not exceeding six months, may be discounted," etc.

But in these instances the farmer must have warehouse receipts or other security to satisfy the member bank or furnish such protection as will warrant its guarantee.

This provision is of great help so far as it goes. It does not, however, afford the farmer permanent capital, nor does it furnish adequate means of supplying him with cash to enable him to produce and market his crop.

LONG-TERM, LOW-INTEREST, AMORTIZATION LOANS.

The legislative action required therefore is to supply such a system as shall meet the needs of agriculture.

When this is done the tenant will be able to acquire a home. People will be enabled to become owners of farms. Occupying owners will increase. Production will increase. Capital can be had to develop the farms and make productive improvements. Some $200,000,000 a year will be saved to farmers in interest on existing mortgages which will be taken up and substituted by contracts at lower rates of interest and on terms which will avoid renewal charges, commissions, and expenses, now most burdensome.

The general principle is to place the resources of the farmer in such position that he can command what he needs of the permanent capital of the country seeking an income at a rate of interest as low as any organized industry can obtain it and on terms of amortization he can readily meet out of his earnings. His security is the very basis of all wealth and therefore the best that can be offered. The plan is to make that security available for his use. This is done by establishing institutions under the law and Government supervision, authorized to issue bonds against collective mortgages on farm lands. The investor will turn to this character of investment because it possesses the features he likes, safety, reasonable income, and long time or permanency.

Such bonds will find a ready market when mortgages would not be considered. The market will be local and national.

In Germany such bonds sold more readily than the Imperial bonds at 3 to 3½ per cent.

There is ample permanent capital; the idea is to put the security in such form as will call it into service for the mutual advantage of the mortgagor and the investor. By putting farm mortgages on an investment basis we can obtain the capital and finance the business and create a sound and permanent agriculture.

When this system is in operation production will increase surely and permanently. It simply means applying the well-tried system of world-wide finance to agriculture.

DISTRIBUTION.

But what is the use to increase production if the producer does not get cost out of what he sends to market?

The number of consumers increases faster than production. Consumers are ready to and do pay fair prices, which if the producer received would give him a good profit. But the consumers pay billions of dollars every year for farm products which the producers do not get.

It is no exception, but rather the rule, that products go to market without yielding any net returns of consequence to the grower.

There is waste all along the lines.

There is no scientific or sound method of marketing farm products. The present practice is all haphazard and uncertain, with the chances against the shipper. The Government can not undertake to handle his products for the farmer. But the Government can create a bureau or commission which will help to establish reliable markets, keep in daily touch with market conditions, domestic and foreign, and be able to furnish prompt and reliable information upon which shipments may be intelligently directed, and generally work out a national system whereby the producers of the country can be fully advised from day to day in such way they can determine when and where to ship to best advantage. This service might extend to procuring transportation rates and can easily be made more comprehensive as the situation developed.

Congress should also enact a law which would require all distributing agents to keep such detailed accounts and make such returns as would enable the shipper to trace every transaction and its correct results, and make it a criminal offense to give a false or fraudulent report and accounting.

With a marketing system properly established the problem of distribution will be solved.

Before we can have good agriculture the grip of the factor, the merchant and the banker, the inevitable outcome of our past financial system, on the credit of the farmers must be loosened. This will be accomplished when the supplemental system to serve the needs of agriculture shall go into effect, to the vast relief and good of all. This present control of credit interferes with, if it does not make impossible, wise diversification of crops and the conservation of the soil, and it limits and narrows the opportunities of the farmer.

Organization and cooperation—not necessarily on the basis of joint and several liability—for the purpose of forming societies or associations by which supplies can be purchased and products handled and disposed of to better advantage, by the exercise of the combined purchasing and selling powers of the producers, would be most helpful.

When the farmer gets a larger control of his credit in his own hands and out of the hands of the banker and the merchant and the factor where it is of necessity now lodged, and must remain, in the operation of existing methods, and when he is in position to intelligently and economically market his products so as to get the best out of what he markets, agriculture will be on a sound economic basis and the country on a sure footing for all the future.

A proper system of finance for agriculture, call it rural credits, and a national marketing system, both in effective operation, will give better agriculture, better rural conditions, and make American rural life what it should be.

If we persist in promoting a burdensome and inadequate system of finance and land development, and a total lack of system in blind, haphazard, wasteful distribution, such as now obtains, we will not need a colossal and ghastly disaster such as Europe is experiencing to bring about our extinction.

Let me, in conclusion, bring home to you by concrete illustration, precisely what it is hoped will be accomplished by the establishment of such a financial system as the commission strongly urges and this bill would provide. Take the actual experience under the Danish Mortgage Society law. Members of the company—farmers—under that law, on loans made by them, respectively, pay a yearly amount of 4 per cent interest, three-fourths of 1 per cent amortization—that is, in reduction of principal—and one-fourth of 1 per cent for expenses, making, altogether, 5 per cent per annum, with the result that in 47 years their debt, principal and interest, is paid in full. Whatever the amount of the loan, whether $1,000 or $10,000, they have the use of the money; they pay 5 per cent per annum for that use, and at the end of 47 years the entire debt, principal and interest, is paid in full. Contrast that with the experience of the American farmer. If he borrows $1,000 or $10,000, he will have to, in the first place, agree to pay it back within three to five years. He will pay 8 per cent per annum interest for the use of it, and at the time when it becomes due he must pay the entire principal as well. Can there be any question about the advantages of the Danish system? The same principle applies under the German system. Take another illustration. Under the system practiced in these European countries, we will suppose that a farmer borrows $1,000. Suppose he wishes to liquidate the entire indebtedness in 18 years. The first year he would pay $40 on the principal and $40 on the interest. The second year he would pay $41.80 on principal and $38.40 on interest, and so on, until in 18 years he would have paid $1,440 and the entire debt, principal and interest, would be paid in full. Under our present system only the interest of 8 per cent would be paid, $80 per annum, and the principal at the end of the 18 years of $1,000 would still be due. In this case the borrower would pay 4 per cent interest on his money and the other 4 per cent would go toward the principal, and his debt under the European system would be canceled.

Take another illustration: Suppose a farmer wishes to borrow $1,000, and he was willing to pay as much as 6 per cent annually for the use of it. Under the European system he would pay 4 per cent as interest, and 2 per cent toward a sinking fund amortization. In 28 annual payments he would have paid $1,680, the interest which he would pay would be at the rate of 2.43 per cent per annum. In 28 years he would have paid the entire debt by paying $60 per annum, which would be 6 per cent on $1,000. Under existing conditions in this country he would have paid that amount, if he could get his money at 6 per cent, and at the end of 28 years he would still owe $1,000. Almost any farmer could make more than $60 a year, by the use of $1,000, but the farmers of this country could rarely afford to borrow money or incur indebtedness on the terms and at the rates which they are obliged to meet now, under our existing financial system, and no commercial banking system alone can afford them the proper accommodations. I want to see the farmers organize in their various communities, establish their local cooperative societies, and, in this way, take charge of their business matters, buy their supplies on the best possible terms, market their products in the best way, and finance their affairs in the most advantageous manner. They can do it. The two great words which should summon them to meet the situation are "organization" and "cooperation."

It is our duty to provide the machinery whereby these two forces may be set to work. The American commission with the United States commission called on the governors of the various States to appoint committees of three to prepare a brief statement as to the agricultural needs of the State, and the result is shown in part 3 of Senate Document 214. Referring to that document, I quote from the statements furnished—extracts to follow my remarks.

This measure will make it possible for those engaged in Agriculture to put into operation the business principle which it is necessary to apply to the farm, to wit:

First. The money needed to be borrowed at a reasonable rate.

Second. This money to be used in permanently bettering the farm and the home.

Third. It is to be borrowed for a long time.

Fourth. It can be gradually paid back.

Some people who have slept all these years; some who have a fixed habit of holding back and never pulling forward; some who always criticize any proposal they do not originate, and who neither have the capacity nor the energy to originate anything worth while; some who devote their lives to faultfinding and scolding; some who never lift, but always lean, and have no encouraging word for the lifters, are already engaged in impugning the motives and purposes of the supporters of this measure and falsely representing its provisions.

They are claiming that under it the tenant can get no relief; that every farm owner must become responsible for the obligations of every other and each member in the system must pledge his land as security for his neighbor; that only the owner of a farm now free and unincumbered can avail himself of the provisions of the bill, each one of which statements is wholly untrue.

If any man wants to purchase a home costing $1,000, and he has or can raise, independent of the property, $500, he could get the other $500 from the Federal land bank.

If a farmer owns a home and farm worth $10,000, and he owes on it $5,000, he could obtain that amount on first mortgage from the Federal farm-land bank and use it to pay off and discharge the existing lien.

Under the bill it is entirely optional with the borrower whether he will help organize and join a cooperative society with unlimited liability on the part of its members, or whether he will become a member of a local association with liability limited as they chose, or whether he will join no association at all and deal with the joint-stock institution provided for in the bill.

The purposes for which loans can be had are clearly set forth to be—

(a) To provide for the purchase of a farm for a home.

(b) To provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and live stock necessary for the proper and reasonable operation of the farm, the term "equipment" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

(c) To provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands.

(d) To liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged existing at the time the loan association is established or incurred for one of the aforementioned purposes.

It would be very unwise to create by law a system that would simply promote or make easy speculation in lands. The loans are intended to be for productive not speculative purposes.

The whole subject has been thoroughly considered and I trust the bill now submitted will be speedily enacted into law.

THE LANDSCHAFT.

It is contended by some that what is wanted is the Landschaft—"an association of borrowers, in contradistinction to the joint-stock mortgage banks, which are associations of lenders."

Mr. David Lubin, American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, an ardent and able advocate of rural credits, says, in Senate Document No. 123, Sixty-third Congress, first session, which ought to be read by all interested in this question, referring to the Landschaft:

All it asks of the borrower is to hand in the interest and amortization on his bond. If he does not do this, the Landschaft takes possession of his land, has it sold to the highest bidder, and returns to the borrower any balance left over above the amount for which he was given a bond, and the costs. The Landschaft can do this in Prussia without any recourse to a lawsuit. Substantially, the Landschaft in all this has the power of final decision vested in a supreme court. If no such power can be granted, then it would be unsafe to have a Landschaft in the United States; in fact, we could not have it, for the purpose of the Landschaft is to secure long-time loans with amortization at 3, 3½, and 4 per cent, and this interest rate would double or treble itself as soon as doubt as to the validity of titles and other questions between borrower and lender would be considered admissible. The Landschaft in Prussia has no such questions to contend with. The Landschaft directors foreclose without recourse to lawsuits. Their decision is final.

Of course, to bring this procedure about it would be necessary to change many State constitutions and the laws of the various States respecting the enforcement of mortgage liens on real estate. We in this generation would never live to see the day when such a system could be put into operation throughout this country.

So, then, we must either have the Landschaft system safeguarded in the United States by State and by National law and administered as rigorously as in Prussia, or we can have no Landschaft system operating safely in the United States.

Such a system is impossible in this country. Why discuss or consider it further? A law, even if it could be passed, providing for such a system would be a dead letter. It would never be workable because of our various State laws respecting registration of title, homestead and exemptions, foreclosure proceedings, rights of redemption, and the like, which no Federal law can change.

The bill now on the calendar offers a practical, workable plan for the establishment of a system which will enable the farmer to finance his enterprise at a low rate of interest and on terms he can readily meet out of his earnings. While it intends to have the bonds issued against collective mortgages, amply secured and perfectly safe, this is primarily in the interest of the borrower, because only in that way can he get the benefit of the lowest possible rate of interest and easy terms. These bonds in the older countries have afforded a safe investment for the funds of widows and orphans, and that would be found to be the case here, and that furnishes another reason why they should be thoroughly safeguarded.

This bill furnishes a sound basis for financing the farm. It will bring real to take the place of fancied independence to the farmer. It will enable him to increase the productive capacity of his farm; to cooperate with other producers and coordinate supply with demand; to standardize products, both as to quantity and quality; to establish a voice in determining the market price of his products.

It will make farming pay. That is a much-needed assurance. Boiled down to the last analysis, that is what we come to—there must be found a way to secure remuneration or compensation in some just proportion to the labor, hardships, and sacrifices the farmer must endure. Put into operation the financial system which the Senate bill now pending provides for and you will accomplish this redemption of agriculture in this country.

Especially will this be true if this legislation is followed, as it must be, because this step will lead to the next, to wit, by the establishment of a plan for more honest and equable economic distribution.

It is necessary not only to have our farms cultivated and cared for and farmers successful as producers, but to be happy and prosperous they must be able to count with certainty on fair returns for what they send to market. Organization among the farmers themselves will follow the changed conditions brought about by the operation of a rural-credit system such as proposed, and this will express itself in a better marketing system, to the benefit of both producer and consumer.

In some respects I feel the bill might be improved, and I intend to offer some amendments, if an opportunity offers, with that end in view, and whether such amendments are or are not agreed to I shall cordially support this bill.

That it will prove to be efficacious and most beneficial to agriculture and productive of immense general good I have no doubt.

ARIZONA.

"The rates of interest on agricultural loans in Arizona may safely be stated to be from 2 per cent to 4 per cent higher than in the case of business men in the same districts."

The principal needs are given, among them:

"Better credit facilities in connection with the marketing of crops and the conduct of general farming operations" (p. 14).

CONNECTICUT.

Mortgages on real estate are free from both State and local taxes. The mortgage note is usually a demand note. Among the needs mentioned are:

2. "Intelligent cooperation among farmers," etc.

4. "Such modification of both law and custom as will make possible long-time loans on land with amortization," etc. (p. 16).

DELAWARE.

Agricultural needs are:

1. More capital for the farmer.

2. Cheaper and better transportation for farm products.

It is hoped "the country will be able to establish an adequate system of rural credits that will do for the farmers of America what the rural-credit systems are doing for the farmers in Europe" (p. 17).

GEORGIA.

"No greater blessing could come to the farmers of Georgia than the installation of a system of land mortgages or land bonding that would bring money to our farmers and landowners for a long period of years at a low rate of interest upon the amortization plan of the Old World countries, with the privilege of paying a part or all of the loan as soon as they desire." (P. 18.)

"With long-term credits upon farm lands, short-term credits on personal securities, and a proper marketing system our farmers will not only produce wealth more abundantly but they will have more money in hand at the end of the year for church and school support, for better roads, for more attention to public health and sanitation, and for more home comforts and conveniences for our wives" (p. 20).

"1. We find that credits cost farmers too much.

"2. We believe that some system of rural-credit banking, based on European models but adapted to American conditions, should be devised for our farmers.

"3. There is great need for short-term credits to enable farmers to make their crops, and lower rates of interest whereby they can work on a cash basis and escape from our present ruinous credit system.

"4. Also we need a long-term land-credit system, with a low rate of interest, under an amortization plan, in order to extend and improve our farm operations."

IDAHO.

The agricultural needs of Idaho are:

"2. Some means provided whereby the agricultural interests may secure long-time loans at reasonable rates of interest."

"At the present time it is absolutely impossible for the new settlers in Idaho, either in the north or the south, to purchase live stock to consume their raw products of hay and grain at the exorbitant rates of interest that is charged them, and also upon the short-time loans that are required by all banks. No farmer can afford to buy dairy cows or other stock, no matter how favorably he is situated, if he has to borrow money at 12 per cent interest, with notes running three to six months. He is doomed to failure under such conditions, though otherwise very favorably situated" (p. 22).

ILLINOIS.

We feel that better business on the farm can be brought about by the establishment of improved rural-credit facilities and the organization of societies for cooperative distribution and cooperative purchase. To this end we recommend the passage of a State or National law, permitting of the organization of mortgage banks to handle farm mortgages on the long-time amortization basis and in accordance with the principles developed by European mortgage banks. We further suggest the passage of a general State cooperative-societies act, which will permit of the organization of pure cooperative societies for distribution and purchase (p. 23).

IOWA.

Notwithstanding many advantages, the agriculture of the State has needs of very far-reaching character.

The most obvious of these needs is the recasting of the present system of land tenancy. At present 40 per cent of the farms of the State are occupied by tenants. Most of the leases run for but one year; a few are for three years, and some for five years. This system of short-term tenancy is bad for the landlord, worse for the tenant, and worse for the land.

Another very serious need of the farmers of the State of Iowa is to learn more generally the advantages of cooperation. The advantages of cooperation and concentration in all business activities are certain and bring sure reward.

Another very great need of the farmers of the State is cheaper working capital. Not only is much capital needed to purchase the land but much is needed to stock the land with the necessary live stock, with buildings, with machinery, with many appliances of various devices, looking to more economic and efficient production. It is high time that on Iowa farms the buildings and other improvements partook more of the character of permanency. This would lead to great economy in time. The investigations of the Department of Agriculture show that for the year 1912 the farmers of the country paid an average of 7.75 per cent interest for short-time loans. In the division of States, of which Iowa is a part, the average rate was 8.05 per cent. These rates ought to be and could be nearly cut in half. The census of 1910 shows that the farms of the United States are encumbered to the extent of one-seventh of their value, or a little over 14 per cent. This proves that farm wealth is a very safe foundation for a system of farm credits, if it could only be made possible by some legal authorization. A system of rural credits similar to the Raffeisen system would prove a great factor in more economic farm production.

As agriculture is the mainstay of our Nation, leading all vocations or pursuits, it seems to us that our National Government should foster and encourage by substantial aid the formation of organizations among farmers.

KENTUCKY.

We feel that some farm-loan system should be worked out and adopted by the Government. It is estimated that the annual interest charges upon all farm indebtedness amounts to $510,000,000, while the entire wheat crop in the United States in 1911 was $543,000,000. Agriculture bears the heaviest average interest rate (8.5 per cent) of all business enterprises, and is the least able to stand it for the following reasons: It is estimated that every 12 years the value of all farm buildings is absorbed by interest charges, that interest charges absorb the value of live stock every 9 years, and every 2½ years the value of all farm implements and machinery.

The farmers should thoroughly organize and have community centers for buying and selling and distributing; have a central marketing bureau in close touch with each community, agency, or exchange, using the parcel post as a medium of exchange and distribution to the large centers of population.

MAINE.

[P. 31.]

Our State is about to awaken to an era of cooperation among its rural population, but a wider and more liberal cooperation is needed. The success of the banks and stores of the rural communities is just as essential as the success of our farms.

Our needs are for more extensive farming and orcharding. Our needs are to build up instead of to deplete the fertility of the soil. We need to build up our live-stock industry; to raise the meat to feed our own people, to market our feed, and keep our soil productive.

We need simpler and cheaper plans to borrow money, but let us first look for security and safety in any new reform.

We need good roads, which will be to us as capital invested. We need to keep more accurate and better accounts of our crops and expenses.

MINNESOTA.

[P. 33.]

Of 160 Minnesota farms reported in 1913, 78 are reported mortgaged. Of this number 33 report the mortgages decreasing. The average rate of interest paid on the mortgage is 6.4 per cent. This rate per cent corresponds fairly well with that reported in 1912 (see Exhibit A)—6.8 per cent for the State average.

Our study of credit conditions shows a marked variation in rates in different parts of this State, with rates varying from a minimum of 5.5 per cent in the southern part to 10 per cent in the northern part.

The rates on long-time loans vary not only in different sections of the State but to a surprising extent even in any given section.

The variation in interest rates on short-time loans is even more marked than in the case of long-time loans. In general the rate of interest varies from 6 per cent in the southern part of the State to 12 per cent in the northern part. Although there is no such dire need of cheaper credit facilities in Minnesota as there was in European countries before cooperative credit organizations developed, yet lower rates of interest would undoubtedly be an advantage to the farmers in many parts of the State. We believe that under the present conditions of high land values it is difficult for the industrious and efficient tenant to acquire ownership of land, and that a system of long-time loans with an amortization feature would be a distinct benefit to such renters.

MISSISSIPPI.

The Department of Agriculture has estimated that the average profit on farming amounts to 5 per cent. If this be true the average farmer who pays more for his capital than 5 per cent is doomed to bankruptcy sooner or later as a mathematical certainty. When has it ever been that agriculture could be financed for 5 per cent or less in the United States? This, in part, accounts for the increase in tenantry and the decrease in home ownership. We believe the farmers should have a system of finances and credits adapted to agricultural needs. First, we believe that farmers need a time exchange extending for a year or so, so as to help him perform the carrying function in the marketing of his crop. Second, he needs system of long-time loans and the payment of same by amortization. He also needs long-time loans to enable him to go into the live-stock business without having to pay all the profits for the use of the capital. Third, he should have provision made for the sale of debentures based on land investments that will furnish investments for those who are now absentee landlords and allow the purchase of their land by the tenants. Fourth, he should have the short-time loan, based on the principle of the open account, whereby the individual farmer may have a rating the same as commercial men, the loan to be provided for productive purposes.

MONTANA.

[P. 40.]

2. Improved farm loan facilities. Farmers should be able to get money for longer periods and at lower interest rates.

NEW JERSEY.

[P. 41.]

In order to provide for the needs already existing and for the expansion of our agricultural industries that is bound to come, we must devise ways and means for hastening the more rapid development of our agricultural resources. In considering these ways and means we can not fail to agree that our problem concerns both the production of farm crops as well as the transportation and distribution of farm products. The feeling has been growing among us and has been voiced in the agricultural and general press of the country, that we have done much for better and larger production, but that we have neglected to help the farmer with his problems of transportation and distribution.

NEW MEXICO.

Possibly no State in the Union presents more of complexity in its rural credits, its farming production, distribution, and rural social conditions than does New Mexico. At least 50 per cent of its people are native or Mexican people, finding their origin at once in the aborigines and the conquistadores, while the other half of our people are drawn from every State in the Union and every country in Europe.

There are two general classes of farmers—the so-called dry farmers, in the northeastern portion of the State, who endeavor by skillful and scientific methods to conserve the rainfall, ranging from 16 to 22 inches annually, and the irrigator, who applies his water artificially.

When the farmer becomes a borrower conditions harder than those imposed by nature surround him. It is perfectly safe to say that the average rate of interest paid by the farmer on short-time loans exceeds 12 per cent, and he has great difficulty in getting money sufficient for his needs. I do not know of any section of the country where farmers can prosper and pay 10 to 14 per cent on the money they borrow.

NEW YORK.

No report, but New York recognizes by State action the need of a rural credit system.

NORTH CAROLINA.

[P. 49.]

It is clear that there is something radically wrong with the facilities for borrowing money on farm lands in North Carolina. From general inquiry in many parts of the State the fact is revealed that few banks in North Carolina lend on farm lands, and that the average farmer desiring to borrow money on his land is compelled to deal with the land-loan shark, and is compelled to pay from 6 to 20 per cent on money borrowed.

Hardly any greater blessing could befall the farmers of North Carolina than the institution of a system of land-mortgage credit that will bring money to the farmers and landowners at a low rate of interest and by the process of amortization or annual installments extend to them the privilege of repaying this money over a long period of years. There is pressing need in North Carolina of a great State land-mortgage institution (or some institution rendering similar service) with proper capital and proper equipment for mobilizing individual land mortgages and issuing bonds against these aggregated individual land mortgages controlled by the farmers.

While the greatest need of the farmer is probably long-time credit, yet there is a great and pressing need of short-term credit.

Our farmers need to develop a complete system of cooperation in (1) getting credit; (2) in buying supplies; (3) in buying and using machinery; (4) in converting raw products into more finished forms, as in ginning cotton, grinding grain, converting cottonseed into meal and oil, milk into cream, butter and cheese, etc.; and (5) in marketing the finished product directly to the consumer.

NORTH DAKOTA.

[P. 54.]

OREGON.

[P. 59.]

Interest rates are too high and in general terms of repayment are not adapted to farm conditions. The State and National Governments should take a hand in securing a system which will provide loans for the farmer upon mortgages and other collateral at rates and upon terms which insure the promotion of the great fundamental industry.

RHODE ISLAND.

[P. 60.]

We could place as first and most difficult in advancing the status of agriculture among us the creation of a mental attitude as to its possibilities and consequent dignity.

To create this new mental attitude three things are necessary: (1) Financial success in farming in Rhode Island; (2) the minimizing of hand labor on the farm and in the home; (3) the enlargement of social life and opportunity through better transportation facilities.

Now, the conditions necessary for success in these specialized lines of farming are three: (1) Thorough knowledge of the application of science in these pursuits, combined with individual initiative and energy; (2) credit facilities of the same kind and extent as are available for the manufacturer and the merchant; (3) organization for cooperative marketing.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

No report.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

The committee on rural credits appointed by the governor passed a resolution which was unanimous indorsing the proposition of rural credits and cooperation.

I believe that if rural credits could be secured for the farmer, enabling him to borrow his money for longer time and without a commission, that it would do more for the farming industry than has been done for it in the last 50 years, and that it would enable a lot of men who are now renters to own farms, which would materially increase the production.

TENNESSEE.

If some method can be devised and put into operation by which the farmers of the State can obtain money on longer time and at a lower rate of interest than they are now having to pay, agriculture in the State will receive an impetus that will result in increased acreage and production under the better methods which would be adopted.

About 45 per cent of the farmers of Tennessee, according to the Federal census of 1910, are tenant farmers. How to decrease this number by increasing the number of farm owners is a problem worthy of as much study as that of making it easier for the landowner to borrow money with which to operate his farm.

TEXAS.

The State needs improvement in the credit and financial facilities now at the command of the farmer. There should be inaugurated a system whereby the tenant may secure long-time credit at a low rate of interest for the purpose of purchasing a homestead and making permanent improvements thereon.

In addition to securing a system providing for putting homes within the reach of the present tenant, there should be established a system for financing the production and marketing of farm crops, the loans secured under this provision being for a short time, in contrast to the long-time credit mentioned above.

UTAH.

[P. 64.]

Agricultural needs of Utah are: (1) More expeditious and economical land-transfer system; (2) a quicker and cheaper supply of money for farm loans.

VIRGINIA.

No report.

WASHINGTON.

[P. 65.]

In Washington, as elsewhere, the farmers are undercapitalized. A system of very long time farm loans is needed on the amortization plan. This can best be secured on the landschaften system of collective security. This State has extended this system from cities and counties and school districts to port districts, diking districts, drainage districts, irrigation districts, and agricultural development districts. It should be extended to provide collective security for loans for 30 years or longer to farmers, payable by amortization. Short-time personal loans are also needed at a very greatly reduced rate of interest and much more easily to be obtained.

WEST VIRGINIA.

It is the hope of the committee that the foregoing pages will call to the attention of our governor and the American commission the need and opportunity for cooperative action among farmers in West Virginia, the proof that such organizations succeed when properly managed, and that this branch of the business of the State is exceedingly small when compared with what might be done if the State should enter with earnestness upon a campaign for better farming, better farm business, and better country life.

Needed—more organized effort among farmers of West Virginia. Our farmers need special facilities for long-time credit. This form of credit is needed by purchasers of farms and builders of homes who are not able to make the payments in the times generally stipulated under the present business system. By what is called the amortization plan a poor young man could buy a farm and borrow the money to pay for it on 25 years' or even 50 years' time. He would be charged for the entire time a rate that would amount to an annual payment sufficient to pay the interest, a small amount for bank administration, and for amortization. In Europe many such loans are made for 54 years at an annual rate of about 4½ per cent.

WISCONSIN.

[P. 79.]

The very progressive character of its people has made possible the development of a keen body politic. Legislation in the State is in an advanced condition and the beneficent results have attracted the attention of many other Commonwealths. The last legislature provided for the establishment of land-mortgage associations to meet the demand for long-time agricultural loans payable on the installment or amortization plan. The purpose of this act is to help those desiring to purchase farms or to improve those already owned. The long-term loan feature is provided for by a bond issue, which enables the borrower to pay off a small percentage of the principal each year. Under the plan outlined in the act 15 or more persons, adult residents, freeholders of Wisconsin, may incorporate with a capital stock of not less than $10,000 for the purpose of making loans secured by first mortgages on Wisconsin real estate. The State treasurer and the association may then issue bonds up to the amount of the mortgage so deposited. The bonds issued are the direct obligation of the association and shall at no time exceed the amount of securities on deposit with the State treasurer. The granting of loans is safeguarded, first, by a provision imposing a double liability upon the stockholders and the obligation of the association which issued the bonds; second, by a requirement that the assessor of income shall certify that the value placed upon any property for the purpose of a loan shall not exceed its market value; third, by a provision that no loan shall be made unless the committee on loans shall first be satisfied that a loan for the purpose specified by the applicant promises to benefit him, and by other provisions for soil conservation, the payment of taxes, insurance, special assessments, etc.

In numerous instances the local bankers and business organizations have instituted cooperative arrangements to enable farm loans to be secured for the purchase of live stock and other direct agricultural improvements at very reasonable rates of interest.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m., Saturday, March 4, 1916), the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 6, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 4 (legislative day of March 3), 1916.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Joseph H. Shea, of Indianapolis, Ind., to be ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Chile, vice Henry P. Fletcher, appointed ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Mexico.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

Nathan H. Boswell, of Dunnellon, Fla., to be United States marshal for the southern district of Florida, vice J. Clifford Brown, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 4, 1916.

(Legislative day of March 3, 1916.)

The recess having expired, the House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House, 1 hour and 55 minutes is set apart for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar not objected to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LETITIA W. GARRISON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6181) for the relief of Letitia W. Garrison.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6181) for the relief of Letitia W. Garrison.

Whereas Letitia W. Garrison, of London, England, was on April 15, 1912, and is now, the owner of fifty 3 per cent bonds of the United States issued under the authority of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provides ways and means to meet war expenditures," approved June 13, 1898, of the denomination of $500 each, numbered 2579, 6419, 9852, 13395, 13411, 21313, 23728, 23729, 25003, 29518, 33594, 37694, 38529, 39129, 39130, 39131, 39132, 43642, 44060, 44998, 44999,

Whereas the said Letitia W. Garrison did, prior to April 15, 1912, detach from the said bonds the coupons due on February 1, 1912, and on May 1, 1912, to wit: One hundred coupons for the amount of $3.75 each, and through her agents, Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell & Co., of London, did deposit the same in the mail at London in two registered letters addressed to Messrs. Drexel & Co., Philadelphia, to be sent by the steamship Titanic; and

Whereas the said steamship Titanic, on April 15, 1912, by reason of a collision, sank, whereby the said letters containing the said coupons were irrevocably lost: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $375 to the said Letitia W. Garrison or her duly authorized agent: Provided, That before paying the same the said Letitia W. Garrison shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury a good and sufficient bond, with the surety to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify the United States against all losses, costs, or damages incurred by reason of making the said payment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HECTOR M. M'DONALD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6758) for the relief of the legal heirs of Hector M. McDonald, deceased.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6758) for the relief of the legal heirs of Hector M. McDonald, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to M. J. Haynes, public administrator of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, as administrator of the estate of Hector M. McDonald, deceased, for and on account of the legal heirs of said deceased the sum of $261.50, taken from the body of said Hector M. McDonald, deceased, and deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States with the First National Bank of Juneau, Alaska, on May 16, 1908, and subsequently covered into the Treasury of the United States by miscellaneous warrant No. 2083, fourth quarter of 1908.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 8, strike out "$261.50" and insert "$261.20."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT B. PEARCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3447) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Robert B. Pearce.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $149.50, to pay the legal representatives of Robert B. Pearce, late of Sevier County, Ark., for amount due for carrying the mail from Fulton, Ark., to Rocky Comfort, in said State, in the year 1861.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that there are a number of these bills on the calendar to-day. I do not intend to object to them, but I would like to call the attention of the committee again to the report of the Postmaster General of 1903. These bills as to amounts are all based upon the report of the auditor, which was transmitted with the report of the Postmaster General. In no case in the bills reported on this calendar is there any evidence shown on behalf of the claimant as to whether the amount had been paid to the claimant by the Confederate Government. The Postmaster General, quoting from the auditor, makes this statement in submitting the report of the amounts that are apparently due on the records of the Government:

Particular attention, however, is invited to that part of the letter from the Auditor for the Post Office Department to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 14, 1903, which reads as follows:

"It should be noted, however, that the Confederate records now in the custody of this office are mutilated and many of the accounts reported on the inclosed statement may have been settled by the Confederate States Government, of which no evidence appears, but as far as can be ascertained these records show individual payments to contractors prior to June 1, 1861, of $457,541.15. This amount differs, however, from the amount reported by the postmaster general of the Confederacy, in his reports of December 7, 1863, and November 7, 1864, from which it appears that out of an appropriation of $800,000 which was made by that government—'under an act approved September 27, 1862, to pay the amounts due to citizens of the Confederate States for postal service rendered prior to the 1st of June, 1861, under contracts and appointments made by the Government of the United States'—claims aggregating $564,544.22 were paid.

"It is evident, therefore, that there was paid by the Confederate States Government $107,003.07 more than is shown by their records of individual payments, and hence it is believed that the statement submitted herewith is to that extent in excess of the amount actually due as shown by the records of this office unless, as indicated in the appropriation act of the Confederate Congress above referred to, the amount paid was made to persons under appointment in the postal service, other than mail contractors, of which this office has no record."

It therefore appears from the itemized statement of the amounts due as reported by the Postmaster General to Congress that there is probably an excess of $100,000 more than is really due. It seems to me that in reporting these cases there ought to be an affidavit from the claimant, or some one who represents him, that that claimant was not paid by the Confederate Government. I think the committee ought to require that on all of these claims hereafter, so that we will not pay the claims twice, as we might readily do.

It is very apparent that the bills in a number of cases reported here were drawn by claim attorneys. Of course, the claim attorney takes this record, which apparently shows on our records that this amount is still due, although it might have been paid by the Confederate Government. But we ought to know from the claimant whether the claimant had been paid by the Confederate Government, because none of us desire to pay it twice.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is a good one. I have no doubt that the Committee on Claims will take such precautions as may be necessary to see that there is no duplication in the payment of these claims. We made a considerable investigation. We had the Auditor for the Post Office Department before us, and he predicted that a very large portion of these claims would never have to be paid. As a matter of fact, we have reported a few bills in which there is no evidence that the claims were not paid by the Confederate Government, but hereafter I think the gentleman from Illinois will find that we will fully protect the Government against any duplication in payment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 9, insert the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having contracts with said legal representatives of Robert D. Pearce for attorneys' fees, a waiver of all fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH A. BUCKHOLDT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2536) for the relief of Joseph A. Buckholdt.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joseph A. Buckholdt, of San Antonio, Tex., the sum of $10,000, in full compensation for injuries received by him by reason of an accident which occurred on January 26, 1914, while in the employ of the United States Government on the Panama Canal.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, page 1, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$3,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NABOR AND VICTORIA LEON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5096) for the relief of Nabor and Victoria Leon.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $780, and said sum of $780 is hereby appropriated, to be paid in such portions and under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe to Nabor Leon and Victoria Leon, being, respectively, the father and mother of Rumaldo Leon, an employee of the United States, who was drowned in the course of his employment on construction work in the reclamation of arid lands at Granite Reef, on Salt River, Maricopa County, Ariz., on February 17, 1909, such sum being the amount to which the above relatives would have been entitled under the provisions of the act of Congress of May 30, 1908, but which they did not receive because the required affidavit of claim was not filed on their behalf within 90 days after the death, as required by section 4 of the said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

F. W. SCHULTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3895) for the relief of F. W. Schultz.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the account of F. W. Schultz, postmaster at Junius, State of South Dakota, to be credited with the sum of $244.78, and that he cause said credit to be certified to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, being on account of loss by robbery of said post office on the 17th of October, 1909, it appearing that said loss was without fault or negligence on the part of said F. W. Schultz, postmaster.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. I will withhold the objection for a time.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman possibly does not fully understand the facts back of this bill. The evidence shows that the claimant has complied with the rules and regulations of the department. There are three affidavits which show that the first statement made to the inspector is not correct, and it seems to me that a man ought to be permitted to correct any misapprehensions or misunderstandings in a statement made to an inspector. This being true, it seems to me there ought to be no objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say to the gentleman from South Dakota that this is a case in which the postmaster did not comply with the regulations of the department—that is, to properly safeguard the funds of the Government—by securely locking his safe, as he should have done, but that he put on what is called a day lock at night, and some man went in there and easily opened the safe and took the valuable that were in it. I think that all of these cases ought to be paid where the postmaster is not negligent, but in this case it occurs to me that the postmaster was negligent in not putting on a proper lock.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman overlooks the fact that the assistant postmaster states that he did not intend to be understood in any statement made to the inspector that the safe was on the day lock only, and he makes three affidavits that this safe was securely locked, that he turned it to the left and to the right, and he says that the statement that the inspector makes is erroneous. Anyone ought to have a right to correct his own statement. A witness upon the witness stand in a court has the right to correct his statement, and I want to call the gentleman's attention to another fact, suppose there was no safe at all in the building, then, under the rules and regulations he would have been permitted to keep his postage stamps and funds in a drawer. In this case he took the funds and put them in the bank. There was no loss except that of the postage stamps, and if there had been no safe there at all, under section 351, subdivision 3, he could have kept them in a drawer. That subdivision provides that where funds or postage stamps are left in offices unprovided with iron safes they must be kept in strong drawers or other receptacles, which must be securely fastened with good locks; also, that the doors and windows of the office should be made as secure as possible, and that the same precaution should be taken when the post office is closed temporarily during the day. These burglars broke open that drawer by force with an iron bar, and if there had been no safe there this man would have been entitled to a refund for these postage stamps. Certainly there is no negligence in this case in any form. This assistant is a citizen whom everybody knows is honest—as honest as any man who ever trod the prairies of South Dakota—and yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] says he will not allow him to explain a statement made to an inspector.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have read these statements, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DILLON. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I know that there is a habit of turning the lock instead of locking the safe securely at night. They turn on what is called the day lock, because it is so much easier to unlock the safe the next morning. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

R. U. DELAPENHA & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2184) providing for a refund of certain additional duties collected on pineapples.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to R. U. Delapenha & Co., of New York, the sum of $782.31, being the amount of additional duties collected from them by the collector of customs at the port of New York, on four shipments of pineapples imported in January, February, and March, 1913; and the said sum of $782.31 is hereby appropriated for this purpose from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES, ENGINEER DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5079) for the relief of certain civilian employees of the Engineer Department at Large, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GEORGE S. CLARK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7817) to validate the homestead entry of George S. Clark.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the homestead entry of George S. Clark, No. 029961, made October 22, 1914, for the southeast quarter northwest quarter, east half southwest quarter, and southwest quarter southeast quarter of section 34, township 7 north, range 13 east, of the Black Hills Meridian, in the State of South Dakota, be, and the same is hereby, validated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NEW ENGLAND COAL & COKE CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7862) for the relief of New England Coal & Coke Co., owner of the American barges Emilie and Cassie, and Bruusgaard, Kiosterud Dampskibsaktieselskab, owner of the Norwegian steamship Hesperos.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim asserted by the New England Coal & Coke Co., owner of the American barges Emilie and Cassie, and the claim asserted by Bruusgaard, Kiosterud Dampskibsaktieselskab, owner of the steamship Hesperos, for injuries alleged to have been suffered in collisions which occurred in Elizabeth River, Va., on October 18, 1915, between the Arethusa and said barges and Arethusa and Hesperos, for and on account of the damages resulting to said barges and said steamship Hesperos, respectively, by reason of said collisions, may be submitted to the United States Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, the district in which said collisions occurred, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages, including interest, sustained by reason of said collisions, if any shall be found to be due, either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to said New England Coal & Coke Co., as owner of said barges Emilie and Cassie, or to Bruusgaard, Kiosterud Dampskibsaktieselskab, as owner of said steamship Hesperos, or either of them, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor, including interest and costs, shall be paid to those entitled thereto or their proctors of record out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That appropriate proceedings to determine such liability and damage shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out sections 1, 2, and 3, beginning with line 3, page 1, and ending with line 6, page 3, and insert the following:

"That the claim of the New England Coal & Coke Co., owner of the American barges Emilie and Cassie, and the claim of Bruusgaard Kiosterud Dampskibsaktieselskab, owner of the steamship Hesperos, for injuries alleged to have been suffered in collisions which occurred in Elizabeth River, Va., on October 18, 1915, between the U. S. S. Arethusa and said barges and U. S. S. Arethusa and the Hesperos, for and on account of the damages resulting to said barges and said steamship Hesperos, respectively, by reason of said collisions, may be submitted to the United States court in the district in which suit shall be filed by the United States to recover damages and losses by said collision, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages sustained by reason of said collisions, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same right of appeal.

"SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due the said New England Coal & Coke Co. as owner of said barges Emilie and Cassie, or to Bruusgaard Kiosterud Dampskibsaktieselskab as owner of the steamship Hesperos, or either of them, the amount of the final decree therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That said suit shall be brought and commenced without four months from the date of the passage of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled 'An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out section 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute by striking out section 2, on page 4.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is no use of section 2 in the bill, as far as that is concerned. Where a decree is entered it is made through an appropriation brought in by the Committee on Appropriations. This only provides that it shall be paid without any further action of Congress. All of these judgments ought to be paid on appropriations. Then it provides suit shall be brought within four months. Suit has already been brought and is now pending. There is no occasion for putting that provision in the bill. This only authorizes the defendant to file a cross libel. Section 2 ought not to be in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Section 3 should be changed to section 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Change section 3 to section 2.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute as amended.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

OSCAR R. HOWARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7804) to authorize the issuance of patent to Oscar R. Howard, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, in consideration of improvements and payments made for and residence upon the land, authorized and directed to issue patent to Oscar R. Howard for lot 3, section 10, and lots 15, 16, and 17, section 15, township 13 north, range 8 west, Indian meridian, Oklahoma, containing 87.78 acres of land, more or less, without payment of the balance of purchase price due under the sale heretofore held, pursuant to act of Congress approved June 17, 1910, entitled "An act to open to settlement and entry under the general provisions of the homestead laws of the United States, certain lands in the State of Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD B. CRAIG.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 87) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to credit the stamp account of Edward B. Craig, as collector of internal revenue of the collection district of Tennessee, in the sum of $2,034.89, being the representative value of certain internal-revenue documentary stamps which were taken from the office of said collector by an act of burglary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the stamp account of Edraw B. Craig, as collector of internal revenue of the collection district of Tennessee, in the sum of $2,034.89, being the representative value of certain internal-revenue documentary stamps which, on the night of June 23, 1915, were, by an act of burglary, taken from the safe in which the same had been properly deposited while in the custody and care of said collector.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Line 5, strike out the word "of" and insert "for."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to credit the stamp account of Edward B. Craig, as collector of internal revenue for the collection district of Tennessee, in the sum of $2,034.89, being the representative value of certain internal-revenue documentary stamps which were taken from the office of said collector by an act of burglary."

PAYMENT FOR CERTAIN SERVICES, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6651) providing for the payment for certain services arising under the Navy Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums of money to the respective claimants enumerated herein, the same being the amount due said claimants for service rendered under the Navy Department as certified to the House by letter from the Secretary of the Treasury March 25, 1914: To W. F. Durand, Stanford University, Cal., $228.05; to Burton McCullom, Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, $325; to Pay Director J. S. Phillips, United States Navy, $70; to Pay Inspector Z. W. Reynolds, United States Navy, $529.93; to R. P. Andrews Paper Co., Washington, D. C., $21.15.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

M. KONDO FISHERIES CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9172) for the relief of the M. Kondo Fisheries Co.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the M. Kondo Fisheries Co., of San Diego, State of California, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7, the same being value of rope and anchor which was loaned to the officers in charge of the launch Cape d'Ano, belonging to the United States Immigration Service, and was lost at sea when that vessel was wrecked on April 30, 1915.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRANK P. SAMMONS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9082) for the relief of Frank P. Sammons.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and there is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $782.50, the same to be paid to Frank P. Sammons, of Davenport, Iowa, as compensation for injuries received by the said Frank P. Sammons while an employee of the United States Government at the Rock Island Arsenal, on August 24, 1904.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "$782.50" and insert "$100."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CYNTHA RAMEY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9377) for the relief of Cyntha Ramey.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cyntha Ramey, of Praise, Pike County, Ky., widow of Marion Ramey, who, while in the discharge of his duties as a posseman, having been duly summoned by and acting with J. M Potter, a deputy United States marshal, was murdered on April 4, 1913, by violators of the United States internal-revenue laws, the sum of $1,000, on account of the murder of her said husband.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $304.54 to John R. Monteith, of San Diego, Cal., as full compensation for the loss of his improvements by reason of the inclusion of his claim within the Navajo Reservation by Executive order dated January 6, 1880.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object, although there is no information contained in the report of the department on this bill except the fact that they drew the bill.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the gentleman to take the time of the House to explain it. I am going to assume it is correct, although I am afraid it will create a precedent that will bother us. We are acting rather blindly on the subject, so far as the House is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. Why, I do not know who drew this bill. It came to the Committee on Claims. My recollection is that, while there is not very much information, it is a fact. This is a case where a man was permitted to go onto a piece of land and take up a claim which had been reserved, as I remember it, and permitted to put on his improvement.

Mr. MANN. There is no reason why the Government should pay such claims unless there should be some exceptional circumstances. I am going to guess that there may be very exceptional circumstances, but they are certainly not disclosed by the department in its letter. If it was not for the fact that the Committee on Claims has been so extremely careful in this Congress, I would not think they were justified in having this bill passed.

Mr. FOSTER. As I remember it, this man puts this amount of improvements on this land. Of course, there is a question whether we ought to pay any of those claims or not. I will agree with my colleague on that subject; but that was the reason why the claim was allowed, as I remember it, because he was permitted to put those improvements on there, and it only provided for the actual expense.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

OSCAR FROMMEL & BRO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2241) for the relief of Oscar Frommel & Bro.

The bill was read in full.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. SWIFT. Will the gentleman from Illinois withhold his objection?

Mr. MANN. I am sorry I can not do that. I object because the bill ought to be discussed, and there is no time for it to be discussed this morning. It will be reached some time for consideration.

ESTATE OF THOMAS J. MELLON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9291) for the relief of the estate of Thomas J. Mellon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Jennie E. Mellon, of St. Louis, Mo., executrix of the will of John S. Mellon, deceased, brother and sole heir at law of Thomas J. Mellon, deceased, the sum of $456.76, said amount being due and unpaid on the contracts of said Thomas J. Mellon with the United States Government for carrying mails on routes Nos. 7861, 7866, and 8014, in Arkansas, in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contracts, and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, on page 1, by striking out, in line 12, and in lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 2, the following: "In 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contracts, and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert "From January 1, 1861, to March 31, 1861, and a sum sufficient for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, as a further amendment to this bill, in view of the fact that the Committee on Claims is inserting amendments to cut off excessive attorneys' fees from these bills for carrying the mail, I move to add an amendment at the end of line 7, page 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Delaware: Page 2, line 7, at the end of the bill add the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with the legal representatives of Thomas J. Mellon for attorney's fees a waiver of all the said fee in excess of 20 per cent."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF JOHN HOWARD PAYNE, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2960) for the relief of the heirs of John Howard Payne, deceased, late United States consul at Tunis.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $205.92 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in payment of the amount found to be due John Howard Payne, late United States consul at Tunis, and that the same be paid to his heirs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH A. JENNINGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6732) for the relief of Joseph A. Jennings.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joseph A. Jennings the sum of $5,000, on account of the amputation of his left arm, incurred while employed in the gun carriage shop of the United States navy yard at Washington, D. C., and a sufficient sum for the payment of the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, line 5, by striking out "$5,000" and inserting "$2,500."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILSON M. DENT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8093) for the relief of Wilson M. Dent.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, line 5, page 1, by striking out "$1,000" and inserting "$800."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by striking out on page 2 all after the word "Dent" in line 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, by striking out all after the word "Dent" in line 2.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. That is entirely satisfactory to the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS P. SORKILMO.

With the following committee amendments:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi reserves the right to object. The gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. SINNOTT. This claim is one that has been before Congress for nearly 20 years. It involves a number of settlers, who made cash and homestead entry by virtue of an erroneous ruling of the Secretary of the Interior, who held that the land was public domain; many of them received patents. That ruling of the Secretary of the Interior was upheld by the Federal court in Oregon. The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, which reversed the lower court, reversed the Secretary of the Interior, and held that the land belonged to a wagon-road company; but in the meantime these settlers and homestead entrymen, relying upon the decision of the Secretary of the Interior and the lower court, made entry upon this land. They lived there the required length of time, five years, under the homestead law. In addition some of them lived there five years longer, until the case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Many of these settlers spent from $250 to $6,000 upon their entries. Many of them were absolutely ruined by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senate has twice passed a bill appropriating for their relief $250,000; this bill only appropriates about $94,000. It is certainly a matter that merits consideration by the House. If the gentleman's objection is solely on account of the lateness of the hour, I would ask to have the matter passed over.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I am perfectly willing that the matter may be passed over. I think it ought to have the consideration of the House, as the gentleman says. That is why I am objecting now. I want it to be considered more at length than it can be now by unanimous consent. That is the purpose of my objection. I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be passed without prejudice.

FRANCES L. LLEWELLYN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4297) for the relief of Frances L. Llewellyn.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4297) for the relief of Frances L. Llewellyn.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow Frances L. Llewellyn to enter, under the homestead law and subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof, lots 1, 4, 5, and 6 and the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 15, township 21 south, range 1 west of the New Mexico principal meridian, New Mexico, Las Cruces, N. Mex., land district: Provided, That the entry and patent therefor shall expressly reserve to the United States the right to take for use, without compensation to entryman, patentee, or her assigns, and or all of the said lands which may be actually needed for or in connection with the construction, operation, and maintenance of the Rio Grande reclamation project.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "and" and insert "any."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CERTAIN INDIANS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The next business on the private calendar was the bill (H. R. 8092) confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the patents heretofore issued in the name of Mary Seaples, June 12, 1907, for the east one-half of the southwest quarter, and lots 3 and 4, section 18, township 23 north, range 20 east of the Willamette meridian; and a similar patent in the name of Silico Saska, September 6, 1902, for lots Nos. 3 and 4, section 16, and lots 1 and 2, and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 17, township 25 north, range 21 east, of the Willamette meridian; and a similar patent in the the name of Theressa Klate, August 1, 1904, for the south half of the southwest quarter, section 29, and lots 2 and 3, section 32, township 28 north, range 22 east of Willamette meridian; and a similar patent in the name of Osella, August 1, 1904, for the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and lots Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, section 25, township 28 north, range 21 east of the Willamette meridian; and a similar patent in the name of Felix, July 13, 1904, for the southeast quarter, section 13, township 23 north, range 19 east of the Willamette meridian; and a similar patent in the name of Mesil, March 7, 1902, for the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter, section 33, township 24 north, range 19 east of the Willamette meridian; and a similar patent in the name of Louis Judge, September 16, 1904, for the southwest quarter, section 24, township 24 north, range 18 east of the Willamette meridian, all situated in the State of Washington be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed as fee simple patents without restrictions against alienation as of their dates of issuance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF NAPOLEON B. GIDDINGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8057) for the relief of the legal representatives of Napoleon B. Giddings.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be invested the circumstances of the alleged taking from Napoleon B. Giddings, in January, 1847, at Santa Fe, N. Mex., and depositing with A. B. Dyer, lieutenant of ordnance, United States Army, by order of Sterling Price, colonel commanding the Army in New Mexico at that time, of 140 kegs of gunpowder, and to ascertain and determine the reasonable market value of such powder at that time and place, not to exceed the value of $1,950, and whether the same or any part thereof was ever returned or delivered back to said Giddings, and the final disposition of such powder; and if the same, or any part thereof, was never returned to or delivered back to said Giddings, then to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the reasonable market value at that time and place of the powder so never returned or delivered back to said Giddings; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid to the legal representatives of said Napoleon B. Giddings the said amount so certified by the Secretary of War to be the reasonable market value of such powder as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, when this bill was up in the last Congress I suggested an amendment which I think ought to go in the bill, on page 2, after the word "Giddings," the following language:

And in the opinion of such Secretary the circumstances of the case render the United States liable for the value of such powder.

That would practically turn the matter over to the Secretary, with authority to adjudicate it.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman think the bill does that now, without that amendment?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. BOOHER. It seems to me it does. It says that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be investigated the circumstances, and so forth. That is at the very beginning of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but it directs him to do a certain thing. Now, it is a long time since this happened. I am willing to take the judgment of the Secretary after he makes this investigation. Ordinarily we would require a claimant to go into court——

Mr. BOOHER. I have no objection to that course being taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Illinois send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. MANN. I do not object. I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN:

"Page 2, line 4, after the word 'Giddings,' insert the words 'and in the opinion of such Secretary the circumstances of the case render the United States liable for the value of such powder.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

GEORGE H. HAMMOND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5185) for the relief of George H. Hammond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George H. Hammond, of Dekalb County, Ga., for injuries received in the performance of his duties under the postmaster and in the post-office building in the city of Atlanta, Ga., the sum of $5,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,200."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

AUSTIN G. TAINTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2638) for the relief of Austin G. Tainter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Austin G. Tainter, of Los Angeles, Cal., to compensate him in full for all claims he may have against the United States arising out of injuries received by him while in the Government employ in the United States Railway Mail Service on the Chicago & North Western Railway in December, 1902.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$1,650."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, there seems to be no statement from the Post Office Department, as disclosed by the report. It seems to me that the House ought to have bills of this character referred to the department in charge of the work where the injury was incurred; and while we are not required to follow the opinion of the department, it is perfectly competent that we should have the opinion of the department. Where a man is injured in the Government service, in a department, we ought to know what the department says, and not rely simply upon somebody's affidavit. Is it not the custom of the committee to refer these bills to the department?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I will say to the gentleman that it is the custom of the committee to refer all matters of this kind to the department. Just whether or not it was done in this case I could not say. The report was not made by myself.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Was not this case before Congress in the last session, and was there not a letter from the department filed at that time?

Mr. MANN. I can answer the question that if there was, it was not filed with the report, because I hold in my hand the report made in the last Congress. The gentleman may have thought I would not have it, but I have it, and the letter is not in the report.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I can not say what the fact was about that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

C. S. BARBEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar as the bill (H. R. 8592) for the relief of the heirs of C. S. Barbee.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Claude B. Barbee, Mildred F. Myatt, and Edward Barbee, sole heirs of C. S. Barbee, deceased, late of North Carolina, the sum of $896.63, said sum being due on the contract of said C. S. Barbee with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 5,096 in North Carolina in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract, and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The following committee amendment was read:

In lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with the said heirs of C. S. Barbee for attorney fees, a waiver of all said fees in excess of 20 per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

J. LAWRENCE LATHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8466) to relieve J. Lawrence Latham, postmaster at Eupora, Webster County, Miss., of the payment of cash and funds stolen from the post office.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That J. Lawrence Latham, postmaster at Eupora, Webster County, Miss., be, and he is hereby, relieved of the payment of $3,098.78, or any part thereof, the same being the amount of cash and funds held due from him to the United States Government for moneys and stamps and other property stolen from the post office of Eupora, Webster County, Miss., on November 15, 1914, by unknown persons.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, a little while ago we had up a bill to which my colleague from Illinois objected, and I thought with considerable justice, where there was a dispute as to whether the safe was properly locked or whether the combination had been thrown. Here in this case, although there is no report from the Post Office Department on the bill at all, the statement is made by the committee that only the day combination of the safe was thrown on. It is not as strong a case for relief as the case presented by the gentleman from South Dakota, and that was of doubtful propriety.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection on the part of the Post Office Department to the payment of this sum.

Mr. MANN. I would rather have that in writing from the Post Office Department, not doubting at all the gentleman's statement; the Post Office Department is not bound by anything the gentleman says on the floor of the House.

Mr. SISSON. This matter has been held up by the Post Office Department for action by Congress for several months. The facts in the case I suppose the gentleman from Illinois is familiar with, except the report is not altogether as full as it ought to be.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to think that the fuller this report is the less justice there would be for the payment of the claim, and that is one reason why it is not very full.

Mr. SISSON. I will make a statement of facts as they occurred.

Mr. MANN. How is the gentleman going to get around this statement in the report:

It is very probable that the fact of the safe being on the "day combination" simply relieved the burglars of a little work, and that these burglars, who were evidently experts, would have taken the money if the full combination had been on, as was done in several instances about that time.

The Post Office Department lays down a rule that it will not pay any of these claims unless the full combination is turned on and the safe is properly locked. It will not pay claims where only the day combination is thrown on. Here is the action of the committee recommending that it be the policy of Congress to pay no attention to the requirement of the Post Office Department, and to pay them, although the safe was left so that anybody with no skill at all could unlock the safe from the day combination simply by listening.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman permit an explanation? The postmaster in this case——

Mr. MANN. I think I can make it shorter, as far as I am concerned, by saying that I am not going to object to this bill this morning. But I will give notice that I am going to object to any bill hereafter that does not present a statement of the department in reference thereto. We are entitled to know what the department says the facts are, without leaving it to the guess of some gentleman, however able he may be, on the committee, who may be influenced more or less by good fellowship.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, how does this differ from the case presented by the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MANN. It is not so strong a case for relief as the one presented by the gentleman from South Dakota, but I do not make objection because some one else has objected to another bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PETER DEEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5986) for the relief of the heirs of the late Peter Deel.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of the late Peter Deel, $164.47, for services rendered in carrying mail on route No. 7487, Mississippi, from January 1, 1861, to May 31, 1861.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having contracts with said heirs of Peter Deel for attorneys' fees, a waiver of all those fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HUNDLEY V. FOWLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8787) for the relief of the heirs of Hundley V. Fowler, deceased.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Hundley V. Fowler, deceased, the sum of $2,202.83, for services rendered in carrying mail on route No. 8697, in the State of Texas, from January 1, 1861, to May 31, 1861.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice this bill is introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and relates to the payment of a claim originating in the State of Texas. I think it is a fair inquiry as to whether this bill is introduced in behalf of constituents of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Are any of these claimants residents of the district of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Yes; they are. I am intimately acquainted with Capt. John Fowler, one of the claimants, who resides in my district. I will say further that I understand another bill has been introduced by a gentleman from Texas. It seems part of the family resides in one State and part in the other. My bill was introduced first, and considered by the committee and favorably reported.

Mr. MANN. We just passed a bill for the claim of one Deel.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I am looking at the report of the department with reference to this claim. That was for carrying mails in the State of Mississippi. I do not happen to see his name in the list reported by the department from Mississippi.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that his name does not appear in the list, but that I wrote a letter on April 12, 1912, to the Auditor of the Post Office Department and received a reply from him in which it was stated that on the books this amount was carried as being due Peter Deel, and that letter appeared in the report upon that bill, beginning at the bottom of page 1.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing whatever to show whether his claim has been paid by the Confederate States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I will say further that there is a supplementary statement furnished, and this amount is carried in that statement.

Mr. MANN. Then this statement of the department which was submitted in 1903, dated I think in 1902, is not supposed to be correct?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. It was supposed to be correct at that time.

Mr. MANN. It is not now supposed to be correct?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. No. I understand that a revised list shows 25 or 30 names left off.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with the said heirs of Hundley V. Fowler for attorneys' fees, a waiver of all the said fees, in excess of 20 per cent."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAMSON PAGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9635) for the relief of the estate of Williamson Page.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of the estate of Williamson Page, deceased, the sum of $675.11, said amount being due on the contract of said Williamson Page with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 5126, in North Carolina, in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract; and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the comma after the word "one" and the following language: "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with the said heirs of Williamson Page, for attorneys' fees, a waiver of all the said fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FARMERS' STATE BANK, EUREKA, ILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8630) for the relief of the Farmers' State Bank of Eureka, Woodford County, Ill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the Farmers' State Bank of Eureka, Woodford County, Ill., the sum of $200, in full compensation for claims on account of the loss of revenue stamps purchased and paid for by said bank and which were lost in the United States mails in transmission of the same from the office of the collector of internal revenue at Springfield, Ill., to Eureka, Woodford County, Ill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF THOMAS N. AARON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 9555, for the relief of the estate of Thomas N. Aaron.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of Thomas N. Aaron, deceased, the sum of $142.50, said amount being due on the contract of said Thomas N. Aaron with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 8798 in Texas, in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract; and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated our of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 9, after the word "sixty-one," strike out the comma and the following language: "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with the said legal representatives of said Thomas N. Aaron for attorneys' fees a waiver of all the said fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PAUL A. SWINK.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10933) for the relief of the estate of Paul A. Swink.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of Paul A. Swink, deceased, the sum of $437.99, said amount being due on the contract of said Paul A. Swink with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 8727 in Texas in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract; and also the further sum of $110.18, said amount being due on the contract of said Paul A. Swink with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 8235 in Louisiana in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract; and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the comma after the word "one" and the following: "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

Page 2, lines 3 and 4, strike out the comma after the word "one" and the words "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I send the following amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with said legal representatives of Paul A. Swink for attorney's fees a waiver of all of said fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN FAULKNER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9556) for the relief of the heirs of John Faulkner.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Lulu Faulkner Crook and Martha J. Thomson, sole heirs to John Faulkner, deceased, the sum of $158.85, said amount being due on the contract of said John Faulkner with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 8,740, in Texas in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract; and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the comma after the word "one" and the words "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "purposes" and insert the word "purpose."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with the said heirs of John Faulkner for attorney's fees, a waiver of all of said fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cancel three trust patents issued to Frank Clare (or Pisa), Lizzie Clare, and Great Bill (or Nomel Yuptal), deceased Wintu allottees, Nos. 275, 276, and 277, respectively, on the public domain, Redding land district, California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

G. B. DICKSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8067) to quiet the title to certain lands in the possession of G. B. Dickson, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title to all the unsurveyed parts of section 16, township 14 north, range 6 east, situated in the county of Craighead, State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, divested out of the United States of America and vested in G. B. Dickson.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the matter just read and insert as a substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee to that portion of land, the title of which is now in the United States of America, comprised in section 16, township 14 north, range 6 east, in the county of Craighead, State of Arkansas, to G. B. Dickson, the present occupant of the land, upon proof by him that there are no adverse claimants and that he has continuously occupied the land since January 1, 1882."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

OCCUPANTS OF TUTTLE TOWN SITE, OKLA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10791) for the relief of the occupants of the Tuttle town site.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to effectuate a compromise settlement of the suit of the United States v. E. Dowden and others decided adversely to the Government on January 4, 1915, by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit and now pending on appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States, and for said purpose to purchase whatever right, title, and interest that said E. Dowden may have in or to the land involved in said suit, said land being situated within the area segregated for town-site purposes at Tuttle, Okla., and to take such other action as may be necessary to quiet the title in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to said land and in the purchasers from said nations at the Government sale of the town lots, and for the above purpose the sum of $57,500, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from February 24, 1916, to date of settlement is hereby appropriated.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill, on page 2, line 9, add the following: "out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the United States is to be reimbursed to the extent of the proceeds heretofore derived, or which may hereafter be derived, from the sale of the town lots within the area affected by such compromise settlement."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman will not object to this bill.

Mr. MANN. It is a vain hope this morning.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It has been carefully worked out——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman has the right arbitrarily to object if he so desires.

Mr. MANN. The matter will come up later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

FARMERS AND MERCHANTS BANK, OF HEADLAND, ALA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10823) for the relief of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, of Headland, Ala.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $34.50 to the Farmers and Merchants Bank, of Headland, Ala., which sum was paid for internal-revenue stamps that were lost by the United States mail in transit from Birmingham, Ala., to Headland, Ala.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," insert the words "and directed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the committee what its policy is. Under the law, a man who buys revenue stamps buys them at the office of the collector, and if he wants them transmitted by mail they are transmitted by mail. He can insure them if he wants to pay the cost of registering the package. But the Government does not guarantee that the stamps will not be lost in the mail. If the purchaser desires to be protected from the ordinary risks of loss in the mail, all he has to do is to furnish the cost of registration, and if he declines to do that why should the Government insure it? We do not insure ordinary mail packages. Now, this is the second bill on the calendar this morning where somebody has purchased internal-revenue stamps. However, in the other case they did pay the cost of registration, and we allowed that claim. Here is a case where they did not pay the cost of registration. Is it to be the policy of the committee wherever people buy internal-revenue stamps, and they are lost in the mail, that that is to be at the expense of the Government, although the people by the payment of the registration fee can have security? In other words, are we to insure everything that goes through the mails?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first case of this exact character that we have had. It is true that this bank did not pay the registration fee, but the committee looked at it in this light, that an order was sent to the Collector of Internal Revenue for the amount of stamps, a check on the bank was forwarded, that check was accepted and cashed, and the money went into the hands of the collector; and it was shown beyond any doubt that the stamps were lost, and the bank got no benefit of them, but the Government got the benefit of the money.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the bank had put money in the mail in an ordinary envelope without registration, and it had been lost, would the gentleman think that we ought to pay the bank for their neglect?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think not.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference between money and stamps?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I do not know that I can draw a very clear distinction, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I think the bill ought to be discussed before it is passed by the House, and for the present I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

HEIRS OF SANTOS BENAVIDES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9458) for the relief of the heirs of Santos Benavides.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Juan V. Benavides and Lazaro G. A. Benavides, only heirs of Santos Benavides, deceased, the sum of $886.60, said amount being due on the contracts of said Santos Benavides with the United States Government for carrying mails on routes Nos. 8594 and 8607, in Texas, in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contracts; and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, lines 10 and 11, strike out "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contracts."

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "purposes" and insert the word "purpose."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require before making payment from all attorneys having a contract with the said heirs of Santos Benavides for attorneys' fees a waiver of all the said fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF S. P. H. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9459) for the relief of the heirs of S. P. H. Williams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mary J. Beedy, Lizzie Tuttle, Sallie Flowers, Nannie Tuttle, and Viola Hendrix, sole heirs of S. P. H. Williams, deceased, the sum of $110.87, said amount being due on the contract of said S. P. H. Williams with the United States Government for carrying mails on route No. 8557, in Texas, in 1861, and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract; and a sum sufficient for said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "and any additional amount due and unpaid on said contract."

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "purposes" and insert the word "purpose."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, before making payment, from all attorneys having a contract with said heirs of S. P. H. Williams for attorneys' fees, a waiver of all said fees in excess of 20 per cent."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. I think there is half a minute more. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] that he ask unanimous consent that on each of the bills passed a motion to reconsider may be entered and laid on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a motion be entered, with respect to each of these bills that have been passed this morning, that the votes whereby they were passed be reconsidered and that those motions lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-day.

Thereupon (at 11 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned until 12 o'clock noon, Saturday, March 4, 1916.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 4, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, so move, we beseech Thee, upon the hearts of the American people that a patriotism so profound shall manifest itself and leave no doubt in the mind of any that we stand as one man for American rights, American honor, American liberty; that the President, his advisers, and others in authority may succeed in solving the great problems which confront us in accordance with the highest conceptions of right and justice, remembering that no problem is ever solved until it is solved in consonance with the eternal fitness of things. And all praise shall be Thine, through Him who taught us the way of truth and righteousness. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. KITCHIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. KITCHIN. To ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the reading of the Journal this morning.

Mr. MANN. To postpone the reading.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to postpone the reading until Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be postponed until Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative appropriation bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday, the pending question was an amendment by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], which, without objection, the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 95, in line 4, by striking out the word "eleven" and inserting "thirteen."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was offered after some conference with the chairman having the bill in charge, thinking some adjustment would be made without detaining the House. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment and offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. I move to amend, page 94, line 4, by striking out "eleven" and inserting "fifteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 95, by striking out, in line 4, the word "eleven" and inserting "fifteen."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain to the committee the necessity for the adoption of this amendment. In the last legislative bill reductions were made in the force of the Bureau of Pensions. Let me call the attention of the committee to this: In the bill appropriating for the year 1915 the legislative bill made the following reductions: Ten clerks at $2,000, 10 at $1,800, 15 at $1,600, 25 at $1,400, 40 at $1,300, 35 at $1,200, 6 at $1,000, and 4 at $900, or a total of 145 clerks. In the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1916 the committee made a further reduction of 93 clerks—7 at $2,000, 16 at $1,800, 10 at $1,600, 20 at $1,400, 5 at $1,300, 25 at $1,200, 9 at $1,000, and 1 at $900.

That is existing law. Now, I believe I am justified in saying that the committee, in preparing and reporting this bill, thought and believed that the bureau could still stand a reduction of one assistant messenger, which is the item under consideration. Can the chairman of the committee tell me how many there are in that place at the present time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I can not.

Mr. RUCKER. I can tell in a moment. Here it is. There are 16 messengers appropriated for in the existing law. The department says it can stand a reduction of one more, but ought to have 15. Now, I believe I quote the committee correctly, or its attitude correctly, when I say that one reason why the committee does not want this amendment adopted is because the committee thinks the bureau has become top-heavy by promoting clerks from lower to higher places and filling the higher places to the exclusion of the lower places.

Now, I want to say a word in explanation. I call your attention to the fact that there has been a very radical reduction in the higher clerkships of this bureau in the last two legislative bills. Under provisions contained in the last two bills clerks had to be demoted, not for inefficiency, but because Congress failed to appropriate for clerks then in the bureau in certain grades; and hence they had to be shifted to the lower places, not on account of inefficiency, but because there was no appropriation made to pay them.

The policy of the bureau has been, when compelled to demote efficient clerks, to promote them again as vacancies occur higher up; and I want to say to this committee I am informed that in every case where there has been a promotion to the higher grade, it has been a promotion of a man who had previously been demoted, not for inefficiency, but because under the act of Congress he had to be gotten out of that class. The bureau has merely restored men of long service and efficiency to places that they formerly occupied, by using them to fill vacancies occasioned by death or resignation. It does seem to me that it is all right to do so. I submit to any gentleman here, that if there is a vacancy in class 4, from what class should the man come to fill that place—from the lowest grade, or the next lower grade? If the Pension Bureau had adopted the custom of going to the bottom or the lowest grade and taking a $660 or $720 clerk and promoting him over the heads of higher classes, there would be just cause for complaint, but that has not been the practice. I sincerely hope this amendment will carry.

Mr. GOOD. The committee reporting this bill have given considerable attention to the question of giving the Commissioner of Pensions an adequate force with which to carry on the business of that office. It is a great department. On December 1 there were 1,182 persons employed in the commissioner's office. I have located in my district a soldiers' home, and I have had a good deal of correspondence with this department by reason of that fact; and I have an interest in seeing that the department shall have an adequate force to perform all of the service, and perform it promptly. I would not intentionally become a party to a movement that would in the slightest degree hamper or interfere with the work of administering the pension laws.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. If the amendment which I have offered should be adopted, it would still mean a reduction of one in that particular class, would it not?

Mr. GOOD. I understand that; but the gentleman has a number of amendments, and I think we must treat this matter as an entire proposition, because many of these men who are employed there are old soldiers, and these positions that are provided for as skilled laborers and messengers are to some extent, as the gentleman understands, largely to pension the persons who hold these positions. That is not true of all of them, but that enters largely into the consideration. The gentleman understands that.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Is it not true that in some of these lower grades, where there is no necessity for a clerk, the department has not put in a clerk, and hence it has not cost the Government one cent?

Mr. GOOD. That is true. Unquestionably the commissioner has a big job on his hands, and we are only trying to help him—to relieve him.

Mr. RUCKER. May I ask the gentleman one other question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Is the gentleman prepared to say that in any class or in any division of this bureau a single clerk has been kept on the rolls who was not needed?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is prepared to show that?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I am prepared to show that.

Mr. RUCKER. I would be glad if the gentleman would do so.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will turn to page 619 of the hearings, he will find that the Commissioner of Pensions has carried on his rolls 27 persons who are detailed to do other work in other departments of the Government. Some of them have been detailed since 1911 to the solicitor's office and to the Secretary's office, and in violation of the spirit of the law.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not wish to annoy the gentleman with questions, but will he yield still further?

Mr. GOOD. That is all right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. I will ask if that is not a condition over which the Commissioner of Pensions has absolutely no control? In other words, under Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, page 177, is it not the express law that the Secretary, and not the commissioner, absolutely controls that matter?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I agree with the gentleman that it ought not to be done.

Mr. GOOD. As a matter of fact, it is done and practically——

Mr. RUCKER. The Pension Bureau ought not to be victimized in this way.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows that in practice the Commissioner of Pensions makes his estimate for his department to the Secretary of the Interior, and then the Secretary of the Interior certifies that estimate, together with other estimates of the heads of departments under the Secretary's office. Of course, the Secretary can revise and change as he desires. Now, if I recall the testimony of the commissioner, it is to the effect that in making these estimates for the Pension Department it was with the thought in view that some of these persons for whom we were making appropriations would be detailed to other departments under the Secretary of the Interior. I say that is contrary to the spirit of the law, and in reporting this measure the committee believe that we have dealt liberally with this department, where the business of the Government is falling off. If the Senate passes certain bills that have passed the House, increasing the work of the Pension Office, I have no doubt that the Senate will amend this bill and give additional employees to perform that work; but I submit that it is not required of the House to make provision for the employment of men to do work that is not authorized by law. It will be plenty of time to take up these provisions when Congress shall have passed those bills.

Mr. MANN. That can be done in the general deficiency bill.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; if not otherwise provided for that can be taken care of in the deficiency appropriation bill. We have dealt liberally with this bureau of the Government, and I am sure no one on the committee desires to hamper the work of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. From July 1, 1915, to December 31, 1915, there were vacancies created in the Pension Office, largely by death of employees, amounting to 36. At that time there were detailed to other departments of the Government 27 clerks, and considering these vacancies and details we have given them practically every position that they had. Yet the work of the department is diminishing very rapidly, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. The bill provides for a reduction of 68. If the amendment which I have in mind carries, there will still be a net reduction of 50 from the force of this office.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but there were 36 vacancies and there were 27 detailed, which practically equals the number of the reduction as reported in the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman ought not to charge up this bureau with these details. That is a matter for the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GOOD. If this bill passes, the Secretary will then be obliged to get along with the force that he has estimated for, for the departments under him; and it is not fair and it is contrary to law for any department of the Government to ask any bureau to make an estimate for more men than will be necessary to do the work of that office.

Now, what is the result? In the past there has been charged up to the Pension Department of this Government about 35 men more every year than was necessary to perform the work of that office, men who were working in some other department. That is not fair to the Pension Department.

Mr. SISSON. And it is a violation of the law to detail men for longer than three months, and yet in this department the same details have been continued for five years.

Mr. GOOD. They have been renewed; there is no technical violation, but when the Secretary estimates for it he overlooks the plain provision of the statute.

Mr. SISSON. The spirit of the law is that they must be detailed for short periods of time, and in this case the details have been renewed for five years, showing that the department did not need them.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; and the gentleman knows that it is impossible for the Appropriations Committee, or for this House, to make appropriations for departments of the Government with any intelligence unless the law is strictly observed in regard to details. We do not want to cripple the department, we want to give them every clerk necessary, and we believe we have done that.

Mr. RUCKER. Who must decide how many are actually needed, the gentlemen in committee or those who administer the office?

Mr. GOOD. We have to determine that after we hear the evidence, and the Congress must eventually decide the question.

Mr. RUCKER. I am trying to present some evidence to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were 17 ayes and 54 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, page 95, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "twelve."

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose—because I am not so entirely stupid that I can not see some things—I suppose that here again the Pension Bureau must receive another chastisement at the hands of this committee. Under existing law the department is given 17 skilled laborers, and this appropriation committee which realizes the importance and justice of allowing $240 a year to buy oil and gas to run a motorcycle has determined in its wisdom that the Pension Bureau can get along with a reduction from 17 skilled laborers down to 2. I care no more about it than any other gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What on earth can this department do with 17 skilled laborers in the Bureau of Pensions?

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman permit me to answer him by asking another question—why on earth did the Appropriations Committee appropriate for 17 if they were not needed?

Mr. MANN. I should say that they appropriated for 17 under a misapprehension of facts, and now that they have got the facts, they cut them out.

Mr. RUCKER. I think they cut the number down to two under a misapprehension.

Mr. MANN. Well, I asked the question for information. I have frequently been in the Pension Bureau, and although my imagination is vivid at times, I can not imagine what they could do with 17 skilled laborers.

Mr. RUCKER. I am not well versed in the work of the bureaus and I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that on February 11 they only had 2 skilled laborers in the Pension Bureau, and there were 15 vacancies which they could have filled, but did not, and, as a matter of fact, in addition to the 2 skilled laborers they have 23 other laborers and 10 female laborers?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not see the female laborers in the bill, though I have tried to find them since the gentleman referred to them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will examine the bill which he holds in his hand he will see that they are provided for.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I take it that I am consuming the time of the House, and I believe I can indulge in a more pleasing pastime by proceeding along other lines; so I am going to consume no more time. I ask the House to adopt this amendment because I believe it is right. I want to say that while I have as much deference for committees in this House as any man, and generally attempt to follow them, I am not going to allow them to do all my thinking for me, not even the great Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say that the committee has no intention to do the Pension Bureau any injustice or to deprive the Pension Bureau of any necessary help in the administration of the bureau. The committee has allowed to the Pension Bureau in its judgment every clerk and employee that is necessary. As a matter of fact there were 15 vacancies in the position of skilled laborers on February 11, and these vacancies had continued that length of time. The Pension Bureau on February 11 only had two skilled laborers, although it had authority to fill these vacancies, and the committee felt that it was not good administration to continue in this bill positions and appropriations for positions when the bureau of itself by its policy and inaction had admitted that the positions were not necessary in the proper administration of the duties of that bureau. As I stated awhile ago, they not only have two skilled laborers, but this bill provides for 23 ordinary laborers and 10 female laborers. I can not understand why the Pension Bureau should require such a great number of laborers. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill, on page 95, by striking out the word "twelve," in line 5, and inserting "sixteen."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 95, line 5, by striking out the word "twelve" and inserting the word "sixteen."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appointments shall not be made to any of the positions herein appropriated for in the classified service of the Bureau of Pensions not actually filled June 30, 1916, nor shall more than 25 per cent of other vacancies actually occurring in any grade in the classified service of that bureau, during the fiscal year 1917, be filled by original appointment or promotion. The salaries or compensation of all places which may not be filled as hereinabove provided for shall not be available for expenditure but shall lapse and shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 95, by striking out all of lines 12 to 22, both inclusive, and inserting the following:

"During the fiscal year 1917 not more than 25 per cent of the vacancies occurring in the classified service of the Bureau of Pensions hereinabove provided for shall be filled except by promotion or demotion from among those in the classified service in said bureau, or by exchange. The salaries or compensation of all places which may not be filled as hereinabove provided for shall not be available for expenditure but shall lapse and shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to attract the attention of the chairman having the bill in charge, and I should like to have the attention of every gentleman here. The provision which I propose to strike out reads as follows:

Appointments shall not be made to any of the positions herein appropriated for in the classified service of the Bureau of Pensions not actually filled June 30, 1916, nor shall more than 25 per cent of other vacancies actually occurring in any grade in the classified service of that bureau, during the fiscal year 1917, be filled by original appointment or promotion.

I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. There is one chief clerk. Suppose that chief clerk should die. Under this legislative provision, what would the office do for a chief clerk?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the commissioner could detail some clerk in the office to perform his duties.

Mr. RUCKER. There would be no authorization to appoint a chief clerk, because the bill says expressly that he shall not be appointed. Then, to carry the inquiry further, suppose the assistant chief clerk should die. There is just one in that class. How would that place be filled? Under the legislative provision no appointment can be made to any class in that whole bill until there are four vacancies in the class, and if there is only one place in the class there never can be four vacancies. Then, again, suppose the medical referee should die, what power would the Commissioner of Pensions have to fill that place? Suppose the assistant medical referee should die, you could not fill his place because there is only one man in the class, and this legislative provision says there must be four vacancies before you can put in one man. Suppose the two qualified surgeons should die, how could their places be filled? If they should both die, the department would have to get along without any, under this legislative provision. Suppose the three stenographers should die, suppose the disbursing clerk or the assistant disbursing clerk should die, suppose the three supervising clerks in the disbursing division should die, what provision is there to fill the positions? None, but the express legislative provision that they shall not be filled. That these gentlemen are intelligent and wise and have given great study and reflection to this, no one doubts, but it does run through my mind that somewhere there has been not that kindly feeling in the breasts of men that ought to exist in every man's bosom in reference to the people that this great bureau deals with.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman if this is a new provision?

Mr. RUCKER. A new provision.

Mr. AUSTIN. Never carried before?

Mr. RUCKER. Never carried before. Not only that—and I am glad the gentleman asked the question, because I want to say to the Members of this House that this is not only a new provision, but that it applies only to the Pension Bureau and to no other bureau in this entire Government. Why should it apply to this bureau alone? Why should it be said that this bureau must be handicapped, bound hand and foot, by legislative bands which these gentlemen have forged and put upon it? Mr. Chairman, if two qualified surgeons were not needed, these astute gentlemen, so careful in guarding the Treasury of this great Republic, would not appropriate for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, if a board of review was not needed, these gentlemen would not appropriate for one.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman if the Commissioner of Pensions recommended this legislation?

Mr. RUCKER. No; of course not. The Commissioner of Pensions does not want to have his office absolutely stripped of power and so tied that when fatality comes, as it will come to some of those old men in the bureau, the bureau must simply go into retirement, because this Congress, following the lead of the Committee on Appropriations, who know nothing about it, says so, and the moving spirit, so far as this provision is concerned, comes from a section of the country where there is not the same consideration given to this bureau that there is in mine. You are asked and will be asked, gentlemen on that side and gentlemen on this side, to stand up and sustain the committee.

The lash and whip of authority will be cracked around the forms of men, and it will be said to them that they must bury their judgment, if they have any, and follow the committee. Let me ask this membership why this stringent provision with reference to this one bureau, and this bureau alone, should be adopted? They have told you that they took away from them such help as they did not believe the bureau needed. I have appealed to you to restore that help, and you have followed the committee. You believe the committee's action is right; that they have left the bureau enough clerks and laborers; and now this committee asks you to go one step further and say that when the final summons comes and when some of those old men answer to the last roll call, the places they occupy now, which carry gladness and pleasure and joy into the homes of millions of people throughout the country, shall not be filled. Why? Because gentlemen in their wisdom say that this bureau, this bureau of all the bureaus of this Government, must be handicapped in this way. The amendment that I have offered is existing law. I want to substitute for the legislative provision which this committee has injected into the bill the existing law. That is good enough. It handicaps the department as it is, and provides that no appointment shall be made until four vacancies occur. What more do these gentlemen want? What more ought they to want? It provides in the language I have offered that before a single additional man can be taken into the bureau there must be four vacancies. That ought to satisfy them; but no; they say in this legislative provision which I want to strike out that before a single man can be taken, in any class, by appointment or promotion, there must be four vacancies in that class. In other words, suppose there are 10 classes there—and I do not know the number—and there are three vacancies in each one of those 10 classes, under this provision the bureau would have to do without the services of 30 men, which the committee say are needed, because before you can put a single man in, even as a messenger boy, there must be four vacancies in that very grade. I hope the gentleman will consider this as I believe this great question merits.

I said a while ago that this amendment is existing law. I want to be entirely accurate. It is existing law with the exception of one clause, the words "or by exchange," and they are put in here to meet the conditions. There are men in the Pension Office to-day, let me say to the committee, who do not and can not perform the work necessary to hold their positions, but who, to draw bread and meat from their services, and who desire to go to some other department where their service would be acceptable and efficient, and another clerk from some other department would be glad to go to the Pension Bureau, and that exchange could be made without costing the Government one penny, a mere exchange from one department to another department, agreed to by the Secretaries and the clerks affected, and not involving a particle of expense in any way to the Government. Therefore, I say, as I said before, I sincerely hope this amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations does not desire to do the Pension Bureau or any other bureau in this Government any injustice. The gentleman, my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], was a little unkind, although I am sure he did not intend to be, when he made allusion to the fact that some members of the committee are from certain sections of the country where they do not have so many pension claims, and I want to assure the gentleman——

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say to the gentleman if I made any remark that in anywise was susceptible to the construction of the gentleman as being unkind I want to exonerate myself. I would not do it, because I think the gentleman is as fair as he can be, biased as he is in this case.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the committee, and I am sure I can speak for every member on the Committee on Appropriations, when I say that we have endeavored in reporting this bill to provide every employee that is necessary for the Pension Bureau.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. The committee believes that every one provided in the bill is necessary, does it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; we do not. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me I will get to that.

Mr. RUCKER. Then the committee has appropriated for men they do not think ought to be there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me I will get to that. A number of years ago Commissioner Warner suggested to the Committee on Appropriations that a provision such as has been carried in this bill be adopted. At first a provision was adopted that there should be no vacancies filled, and subsequently the present provision was adopted providing that only 25 per cent of the vacancies should be filled. Now, the gentleman from Missouri asks me whether or not I believe that the Pension Bureau needed all of these employees for the next fiscal year. I say to him frankly I do not; but your committee and the past Congresses have never been willing deliberately and arbitrarily to cut that force down so as to deprive any employee of that bureau—any old soldier who works in that bureau—of his position, but they have adopted the more merciful method of providing that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the bureau it shall not be filled, or, at least, not more than 25 per cent of the vacancies shall be filled. That is the attitude of Congress. That is what Congress has adopted in the past, simply, as I say, with a view of not depriving any old soldier in that bureau of his position; but when a vacancy occurs by death or resignation the place shall not be filled, and I submit to the gentleman if that is not a proper, fair, and merciful method? Your committee has not undertaken in this bill to cut out a single employee of the bureau, but it has endeavored to bring an amendment here which will prevent the filling of unnecessary vacancies whenever they occur.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee agree with the gentleman from Missouri that in the construction of the language in the bill in order to fill vacancies there must be at least four vacancies in each particular class?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true; and I will tell the gentleman why the committee has recommended that provision. Heretofore the Commissioner of Pensions was authorized to fill 25 per cent of the vacancies in all classes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, what has been the result? The result has been that whenever a vacancy occurred, say in the fourth class or in the $1,800 grade, the commissioner would immediately fill the vacancy by promotion from lower grades and leave a vacancy in the lowest grade unfilled. Then, of course, when four vacancies occurred, why, he would fill one of them. The result has been that all or nearly all of these vacancies in the Pension Bureau have been in the lowest grade, by reason of the fact that whenever these vacancies in the higher grades occur the Commissioner of Pensions promotes from a lower grade. We say that is not what Congress intended.

I am not reflecting on the Commissioner of Pensions, because he is a splendid gentleman and a man whom I admire and respect, and who I know is attempting to do and is doing his duty as he sees it. He has only acted within the law, and I am sure the pressure on him was great, no doubt from Members of Congress, and this provision really operates for his protection and will save him from annoyance. But what has been the result of that action? It has resulted in the filling of these higher grades with an extraordinary percentage of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, right along the line the gentleman has been talking, I am somewhat in sympathy with his idea there; but suppose there are not four positions in the grade where there may come a vacancy, how are you going to fill it if this provision is enacted into law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If this provision is enacted into law, of course, no vacancy in the grade can be filled unless there are four vacancies.

Mr. HAMLIN. But suppose there are not four places in the grade and one of them becomes vacant, how are you going to fill that if this becomes a law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. You can not fill it until there are four vacancies.

Mr. HAMLIN. Suppose there are but two places in that grade and one becomes vacant?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. You can fill that by detail under those circumstances. Take the case of the medical referees to which the gentleman referred; we have a number of medical examiners who can be detailed to fill those places. I want to say this to the gentleman, that there is not a bureau or department of this Government to-day that is going to suffer because some particular man may die or resign in the department. Why, we have not had a Secretary of War or an Assistant Secretary of War for more than a month, and yet the business of that department is not suffering by reason of that fact.

We have a gentleman detailed and appointed Secretary of War ad interim, who is performing those duties, no doubt, in an acceptable manner, and the same would be true in such a case as that to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, why could not all of these cases be filled by detail? And, then, would not this provision of the law become absolutely valueless?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They might be detailed, but they would be detailed at the salaries they are now drawing.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman think it would be fair to take a man drawing, say, $1,000 a year and detail him to do the work of the chief clerk at that salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think a case would not arise where a man at $1,000 a year would be detailed to perform the duties of a chief clerk. The gentleman takes an extreme case.

Mr. HAMLIN. But does the gentleman think that a man drawing the salary of a low grade ought to do the work of a man of a high grade?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I wish to say that there are 99 clerks of class 4 in the Pension Bureau to-day, and I take it if the position of chief clerk was to, unfortunately, become vacant, one of those clerks would be detailed and the work would go along in a proper manner. Then, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has suggested to me, there is an assistant chief clerk, who would, of course, perform the duties; and then, if necessary, an $1,800 clerk would be detailed to perform the duties of assistant clerk.

Now, the total number of clerks in all of the four classes in the Pension Bureau is 786. The total number of clerks in class 4, the highest-paid class of clerks in any of the departments, is 99, which is more than 10 per cent of the whole number of clerks in the Pension Office in this higher class.

Now, let us take the Census Office for comparison. We know that the work in the Pension Bureau is not of a technical nature. It does not require any particular mathematical ability to perform the duty of a clerk in that bureau, but it is somewhat different in the Census Office. And let us see what the condition is in the latter office. The total number of clerks of the four classes in the Census Office is 323, and the total number of clerks of class 4 is 15. Thus less than 5 per cent of the whole number of clerks in the Census Office are of this higher grade.

Now, I want to submit to you, gentlemen, in all fairness, under the operation of the law which has been carried upon this legislative bill we are gradually building up a top-heavy condition of affairs in the Pension Bureau, because, as I stated, under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], the Commissioner of Pensions frankly states in these hearings that it is his custom and his policy when a vacancy occurs in one of these higher grades to promote all up and down the line, and in a few years, if that kind of condition continues to exist, you will have in your Pension Bureau no clerks of the lower grades; and certainly Congress does not desire to bring about any such condition of affairs. And that is the reason your committee, in the effort to equalize promotions and to keep this bureau as nearly as we could on an equality with other bureaus in the other departments of this Government, proposed this amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just for a moment.

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose a medical referee should die, does the gentleman think he could get a $1,000 clerk to act in his place?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I said a while ago, this bill provides for 11 medical examiners, who have technical knowledge, and who could be detailed to that position for the time being, any one of them, and it would not be necessary to detail a clerk for that purpose.

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose they should all die, what are you going to do about it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is submitting a question that he knows is far-fetched and can not happen under any circumstances.

Mr. RUCKER. It is not any farther-fetched perhaps than the fact that he is making appropriation for services that he knows are not needed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I can show the gentleman from these hearings that these positions are not needed, will he vote to cut these old soldiers out?

Mr. RUCKER. No; I will not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly the gentleman would not; and yet the Commissioner of Pensions in his hearing states that the Efficiency Division advised him that by the installation of certain machinery he could dispense with 100 clerks in one division alone.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the gentleman will find that on page 628 of the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hate to impose on the committee, but I have a statement which I desire to make, and I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And it was for that reason, gentlemen, that I stated I believed, without any injustice to the Pension Bureau, we could safely have adopted a provision upon this bill, such as was carried years ago, to the effect that no vacancies should be filled during the next fiscal year.

We know that the work is decreasing, and your committee, without any intention of doing injustice to anyone, desired, if it could, to correct this injustice that was being done by these promotions to which I have alluded; and this was the only plan which the committee felt could be properly devised to prevent it.

Now, I want to call your attention to some of the past history of that bureau. For the fiscal year 1883 Congress increased the working force of the Pension Office from 439 persons, with total pay of $591,010, to 1,559 persons, with total pay of $1,957,150, an increase of 1,120 employees, with total pay of $1,366,140.

This remarkable increase at that time was on account of the great flood of pension claims filed under and because of the arrears of pensions act passed in 1879.

Before any appreciable reduction was made in the Pension Office force another considerable increase of 455 persons was added to its number of employees and $488,060 to its annual pay roll because of the passage of the pension law of 1890.

Substantially all of the claims under the arrears act of 1879 and under the general law of 1890 have been adjudicated.

The more recent act of May 11, 1912, basing Civil War pensions on age, entailed little clerical labor on the Pension Office beyond the work which was done by temporary clerks under a special appropriation of $300,000 made for the purpose.

Practically no reductions have been made in the Pension Office since the great increase provided for in 1883, except to the extent that vacancies might occur from year to year; consequently there are now 1,182 persons, with annual pay amounting to $1,518,650, provided for in the office, or nearly three times the normal force and annual pay existing at the time the great addition was made in 1883 for the express purpose of clearing up the work of accumulated claims for arrears that long since have been disposed of.

At the time of the increase made in the Pension Office force because of the pension laws of 1879 and 1890 commensurate increases were made in the office force of The Adjutant General of the War Department in order to supply the military records of claimants under those laws, but all of those additional employments have been dropped from the pay rolls. Yet, as I say, there have been no reductions in the Pension Office except from year to year as vacancies occur.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, the gentleman does not mean that, if I understand him correctly. The gentleman recollects that in the bill for the fiscal year 1915 there were 145 dropped, and that in 1916, 93 were dropped, and this bill drops 67.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No one was dropped in those cases. Those represented transfers to other departments. This bill, I will say to the gentleman, does not contemplate the dropping of a single employee in the Pension Bureau.

Now, what are the facts? There were forty-odd vacancies occurring in the first six months of this fiscal year. There were 33 vacancies existing at the end of the first six months of the fiscal year. There were, as the gentleman from Iowa stated, 27 details from that office to other bureaus in the department, including the Secretary's office. This bill proposes to reduce 67. I take it, necessarily and in all probability, judging the future by the past, there will be a like number of vacancies to occur between December 31 and June 30 of this year. But whether that should prove true or not, as I state, these vacancies exist down there, and we have simply dropped from the Pension Bureau a sufficient number to take care of those vacancies and those various details.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. When a vacancy is filled by a promotion, that creates a vacancy below. Is that filled then?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennesssee. That is filled all up and down the line until they reach the lowest paid copyist in the bureau, according to the hearings.

Mr. FESS. Is this legislation looking to a reduction of force by virtue of a reduction of the amount of work in the department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are too many employees now in the Pension Bureau who are really not needed. That is my firm conviction.

Mr. FESS. I am asking purely for information. I want to vote right on it. Is the purpose of the legislation to look forward to the time when the work in the Pension Office will grow less and less constantly?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, yes. The gentleman knows that the work in the Pension Office is growing less and less. It is constantly decreasing. As a matter of fact, those pensioners under the Sherwood law have all been placed on the roll and the work is necessarily decreasing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

There is no request for this legislation from the Commissioner of Pensions, who is charged with the responsibility of administering that bureau. Why should the Committee on Appropriations take such a step without consulting the head of that bureau about this new legislation? It seems to me he, of all men, ought to be asked about how this change is going to work, whether for good or detriment to the public service.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. In a moment. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, this is an effort to prevent the head of that bureau from promoting clerks in that bureau who are entitled to promotion when a vacancy occurs in the higher grade.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. There has not in the last fiscal year been a single promotion, except in those cases where worthy men had to be demoted.

Mr. AUSTIN. I know the policy of the Commissioner of Pensions, where a vacancy occurs in a higher grade, is to examine the efficiency record of the clerks in the bureau to determine who is entitled to the vacancy. Now that is right; it is just; and this body ought not by this proposed change of the law to attempt to deprive a worthy, competent, and efficient clerk in that bureau of a well-earned promotion.

The clerks in that bureau, as far as obtaining deserved promotions, ought to be treated precisely like the clerks in every other department of this Government, and it is unfair to discriminate in this way against them. We were discussing this question a day or so ago as to promotions in the various departments, and the statement was made that clerks in the four classes had the opportunity of being promoted at some time, but here is an attempt to deny promotion where a vacancy occurs. Now, while perhaps the work in this department is decreasing, we have passed in this House a bill to pension the dependent widows and orphan children of Spanish-American veterans, which will mean additional work for the bureau. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported out a general pension bill affecting the widows of Union soldiers who married between 1890 and 1905, which will mean additional work. It is unfair to detail a clerk on a salary of $1,200 a year to perform the duties of a clerk on a salary of $1,600 or $1,800 or $2,000, and not give that clerk additional compensation for the extra work or more important work in a different class. This legislation means to force a clerk drawing a salary of $1,200 a year to be detailed to perform the work of a clerk at $1,800 a year and to receive no additional compensation for it, which is unjust and unfair.

Mr. RUCKER. And applies only to this bureau.

Mr. AUSTIN. And, as the gentleman from Missouri well says, it will apply only to this bureau.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the reason why this provision applies only to this bureau is that this is a disappearing bureau. The time is rapidly approaching when but few of the Civil War veterans whose names are now on the pension roll will be drawing pensions from the Government. Our sympathy goes out to those soldiers who for years have been performing services in the Pension Department, and the Commissioner of Pensions and his able assistants have the sympathy not only of the Appropriations Committee but of this House in trying to arrive at some plan whereby not a single man will be thrown out of his position.

The fact is, as was stated by Commissioner Warner when he was commissioner, that we could well write into the law a provision that where vacancies occur in the Pension Department no one should be appointed to fill those vacancies. Now, what have we done? The present law provides that in cases of vacancies in the department only 25 per cent of the vacancies shall be filled. Now, what happens under the law? We have clerks of various grades—clerks of class 4 receiving $1,800, of class 3 receiving $1,600, of class 2 receiving $1,400, of class 1 receiving $1,200, and clerks receiving $1,000, messengers receiving $840, and assistant messengers receiving $720. Suppose under the existing law there are 60 vacancies caused by deaths in that department, covering all these various grades; what has been the practice of the commissioner in filling these vacancies under the law? If there are 60 vacancies in the department, as a general rule the commissioner fills the vacancies by appointment to the highest grade. The result is that that office is becoming top-heavy with these higher salaried positions. This, too, notwithstanding the fact that as to many of them we provide for their salaries largely as a pension. It is not because we need the services of all these clerks, but because we have not the heart to throw any of them out of a job. Now, these are the real facts of the case.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman does not mean to be understood to say that there is any promotion to class 4 unless there is a vacancy in class 4?

Mr. GOOD. Under the present law the commissioner can fill all the vacancies in classes 2, 3, and 4, up to the 25 per cent of the total vacancies in the bureau, and he has done this largely, leaving the lower salaried places vacant.

Mr. RUCKER. But he can not fill any vacancy until it occurs.

Mr. GOOD. Of course not. I do not mean to say that he has attempted to fill any vacancy not existing. I mean to say that where there are 60 deaths or vacancies, covering various classes, the commissioner then can fill 15 places, under the present law, by appointing only clerks of class 4, and he fills the vacancies largely by appointing the clerks receiving the higher salaries. Now, that ought not to be.

Mr. RUCKER. He can only fill a vacancy when there is a vacancy to fill.

Mr. GOOD. This provision in this bill simply means that where there are four vacancies in class 4, he can appoint one clerk of class 4. When there are four vacancies in class 3 he can appoint 1 to class 3, but he can not, contrary to the wishes of this House and of Congress, make this bureau topheavy, when we are trying as best we can to work out some plan whereby we can reduce the force so that it will not be necessary to discharge a single man. Now, we all know that in this department there are many more clerks than are necessary to do the work, yet we are not reporting a bill here that will throw a single man or woman out of his or her position. We are trying to take care of them all, every one, and our efforts ought to have the approval of the House.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely sure there is not a single member, either of the subcommittee or of the full committee, who has the least desire on earth to do any human being any injustice; but as has been stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], a member of the committee, who has just taken his seat, we have endeavored to draw this amendment so that no human being in the Pension Department will lose his place. We have also drawn the amendment so that when a man dies in class 4 there shall not be a promotion from 3 to 4, thereby creating a vacancy in 3, and then a promotion from 2 to 3, creating a vacancy in 2, and a promotion from 1 to 2, filling the vacancies thus made in 2, and a man promoted from $1,000 to $1,200, thus pushing every man up. The committee inquired as to that, and the Commissioner of Pensions stated that he did that and that that was his rule. Therefore that is really saving no money to the Treasury by that operation, but every man gets a promotion every time a man in the highest grade does. Now, as to any vacancy occurring in a chief clerk's position, it is just as if a man takes his 30 days' annual leave or his 30 days' sick leave, or if he is sick for a current 12 months. An $1,800 clerk in every department of the Government is detailed, at his salary, to perform the duties of the position of chief clerk. All of the clerks are glad to get that particular detail, because when the time comes that the position of chief clerk has to be filled, the man who has been detailed to do the work ad interim has had the experience that will justify his promotion, and the clerks all look upon it as a matter of honor. And really they do not have as much hard service while acting as chief clerk as they do in class 4.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. If there is a vacancy in the $1,800 class in any other bureau of the Government, are not the clerks promoted up?

Mr. SISSON. That is not the general rule. On the contrary, in reference to all other departments of the Government they frequently fill that appointment by promotion, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, or by detail from another office, but they do not fill the vacancy with the express purpose of causing an increase of salary all along the line and then fill the one in the lower grade. The reason that this is a peculiar case is because back in 1882 they had a little less than 500 men in this department. Two or three years after that, owing to a change in the law, the whole department was congested and behind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. They then were given about a thousand clerks in order that they might catch up with the work. Later, in 1890, they were given 400 clerks, and then they were given $300,000 to catch up with the work in 1893, 1894 and 1895—along there.

Then the work became current. They had an oversupply of clerks with the expenditure of $300,000. So at that time, 15 years ago, they had about 2,200 clerks in the Pension Office. Every Commissioner of Pensions has been careful not to discharge them, and especially old soldiers. They desired to keep them on the roll, and they desired that even though they might not be up to the standard efficiency, that some scheme should be devised so that they should not lose their places.

Now, the passage of the Sherwood pension bill only required that a man shall be so old to get a pension status, and during the discussion of the law it was urged that the reduction in the Pension Office in the city of Washington would be very great.

Now, we have not done anything radical. We have provided here that the surplus service of employees shall retain their places until by death it is gradually decreased, but for fear that we might do some injustice, we did not continue the practice that once prevailed that no vacancy should be filled, but we say that 25 per cent might be filled, for fear we might do some portion of the Pension Office an injustice.

But we found that when the present law was in operation the very thing resulted that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] spoke of. The men were arbitrarily promoted, and when the Commissioner of Pensions was asked about it he smiled and said, "When you get a vacancy in a high grade, when you get a vacancy in class 3, somebody in class 4 wants it, and in order to keep peace it becomes necessary to fill the vacancy in the higher grade." In order to protect the Commissioner of Pensions from clamor and dissatisfaction we have put in the law a provision that until four vacancies occur not more than one vacancy shall be filled in that class.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were 20 ayes and 32 noes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen Members present, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bottom of page 93 for the purpose of offering an amendment to the paragraph providing for the printing of State maps.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to return to page 93 for the purpose of offering an amendment with reference to State maps. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. Reserving the right to object, the amendment would necessarily involve a change of the language of the bill, and that would presuppose that the committee had made a mistake. I can not admit that, and I therefore object.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will reconsider——

Mr. RUCKER. I withdraw the objection this one time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 93, strike out lines 22, 23, and 24, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For separate and State and Territorial maps of public-land States, including maps showing areas designated by the Secretary of the Interior under the enlarged homestead acts prepared in the General Land Office, $3,000."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment follows the language of the current law, but it does not increase the appropriation to the amount of the estimate by $300.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman to say that the language of the amendment is the same as the current law.

Mr. MONDELL. With one exception.

Mr. RUCKER. That was the case in the amendment I had, but it does not signify anything.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentlemen of the committee will be more favorably inclined to my return to the current law than they were to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the committee will not go back to last year's law but will progress and make new law.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this is a matter I am reasonably familiar with. The Chairman will recall that I had something to do as an official of the Land Office with the issuance of State maps years ago, and I know that this appropriation is absolutely essential to the transaction of the public business.

The committee, I think, was misled or got an erroneous impression from the statement made by the commissioner, that in the recent past they had printed maps of Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and it seems to have occurred to the committee that it was not wise or necessary to print maps of those States where the public surveys were complete, and the lands all entered. It was necessary, it was essential, to print final public-land maps of those public-land States. In the case of Iowa the old map was 37 years old. There has been a considerable amount of change of survey lines in the interval. This was a map that shows Iowa on the basis of the public-land records, and it is the complete and final map of the State of Iowa. That is the case with Alabama and, I think, the case with Arkansas. These maps of Arkansas were necessary, I want the gentleman to remember, by reason of the fact that some years ago we passed a law authorizing a resurvey of a large part of the St. Francis Basin in Arkansas, and it was necessary to have a new map in order to present those surveys as they appeared on the records of the General Land Office. I assume that completes Arkansas so far as land maps are concerned. In the public-land States where they are disposing of lands all of the time and extending surveys all of the time, the changes occur to such an extent that it is necessary once in every 5 or 10 years, depending upon the rapidity with which the surveys are extended, to publish a new map, and it is under this appropriation that those maps are published. This is not the appropriation, let me remind the committee, under which the maps are prepared. It is the appropriation under which they are printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The maps will be prepared; they must be prepared. As the surveys are extended the map of the State in the land office is kept current with the conditions as they exist, so that this map is prepared for printing under other appropriations. It costs about six or seven hundred dollars to print a State map, and under this additional sum of fifteen hundred dollars it may be possible to print three State maps the coming year—two at least—and there are a number of States where a new State map is needed. This is an appropriation that has been carried many years, and is as much needed now as it ever was. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will accept the amendment. I do not care to take up the time of the committee. The matter is so essential that it does not seem to me that there ought to be any question about it. Let me make this further suggestion to the gentleman in charge of the bill. The provision which we make in the bill as it is before us is for a map which is not nearly so important or essential as the regular State map. This colored enlarged homestead map is quite a new thing, and we have been printing them for a few years, and we could not well get along without them. They are wholly a matter of convenience, but the State map is much more than a matter of convenience, although the Commissioner of the General Land Office rather through a slip I think suggested that some of them were largely a matter of convenience. They are the record of the fact of the Government surveys; they are absolutely essential to a knowledge of conditions. If we do not print them this year, we will have to print them next.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon this subject which was issued yesterday. I wish to say in this connection that taking the State of California as an example there are many, many demands for these maps. They have been exhausted for the last six or nine months, so far as the Representatives being able to obtain them is concerned, in order to distribute them for actual requests by those who are directly interested in the public lands of California, and, of course, that applies to the rest of the public-land States. The department in its last letter states it will be hampered in this work, that it will not be able to distribute the maps as it has been heretofore, although the appropriation heretofore allowed has not been sufficient to provide a sufficient number of those maps for distribution to those actually interested and who actually use them, and we believe they are actually necessary. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], having charge of the bill, in the interest of a proper administration of the public-land law, as well as giving the public proper information to which it is entitled, may see his way clear to withdraw his objection to this amendment. The amendment should be adopted by the committee. It is a proper expenditure and the amount asked is very reasonable.

The letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I read, is:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, March 3, 1916.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

My Dear Mr. RAKER: By reference to the legislative bill now before Congress you will note that the item of appropriations for State and Territorial maps and for enlarged homestead maps has been cut in two, leaving only an appropriation of $1,500 for the enlarged homestead maps.

I call your attention to this matter as you are well aware of the use and demand for these State maps in the Western States.

Yours, very truly,

CLAY TALLMAN.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to take the floor in opposition to the amendment, because I think it ought to pass, and I believe I can secure its passage in that way. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] speaks of his ancient knowledge on the question pertaining to maps, and it is conceded that he has great knowledge upon the subject. He makes other interesting statements with reference to the necessity for agreement to this amendment, but he forgets that to-day he is a good deal like the Irishman I heard of who fell from a 10-story building. After being taken away on a truck to some junk shop, a surgeon was called in and pronounced him dead. But Pat had survived, and he said, "By gorra, you are a liar"; when his wife who was present said, "Keep still, Pat, the doctor knows best." I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that the doctor—the Appropriations Committee—knows best. The only reason I am opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is because I think by opposing it I may help it to be carried.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anyone in this House who appreciates more than I do the efforts of the Committee on Appropriations to practice economy in expenditures. I do very seriously object, however, to all of their economies being applied to the Western States. It seems to me that they evidently are not informed in regard to the necessity for this appropriation, and, as I remarked yesterday, instead of getting information from the people who really have it regarding the West, the committee depends upon the suggestion of some officer of the Government, in this case the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I happen to know that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is very anxious to have this appropriation restored to what it is under the present law. We have been expending a great deal of money in opening up the West; we have given land to the railroads to encourage railroad building; we have sent expeditions out into that country from time immemorial, almost, to open up the West; and why not make these maps available to the intending settlers in order that they may know what land is open to settlement.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the same condition apply to the gentleman's State as it does to California, that these maps are exhausted, and that we have been unable to get them to send to those who actually want to become settlers in the West, and need them for their information?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is absolutely true, excepting this, Mr. Chairman, that since the map of Idaho was made three years ago five additional counties have been created and the few maps of Idaho yet remaining in the Land Office do not show those additional counties.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; I have only a few minutes. We have laws passed defining the different kinds of land in the West. Some of it is withdrawn for forest reserves, other lands have been withdrawn for coal reserves, others for phosphate reserves, and when the intending settler goes out into that country, or those living there desire to locate on the public land, they naturally go to the official map issued by the General Land Office to see under which law they should enter.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman state to the committee where they found these five additional counties?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They got them by dividing up some other counties.

Mr. GOOD. Was it not land shown on maps previously made?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; but the present map does not show the location of the boundaries of those counties nor the county seats.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware of the fact that there are a number of land laws that can only be complied with through a knowledge of county boundaries?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. For instance, certain affidavits must be taken in a county, and if the land-office map is misleading in that respect, a man may lose all of his rights by reason of the lack of knowledge?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is very true.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these maps are largely for railroad excursions?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; I made no mention of railroad excursions.

Mr. BORLAND. Did not the gentleman say a little while ago they were used for the purpose of getting up railroad excursions?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman was evidently thinking of something else when I referred to railroads. I said the Government has been giving public land to the railroads in the western country to encourage the settlement of the country. Now, we want to open up that country; we want people to come there, and when they do come there we want them to learn something from the official records as to the character of the land in the various localities.

Mr. BORLAND. I call attention to the fact that all the money for enlarged homestead maps has been provided.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman spoke about the advantage of large State maps.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They have cut out the provision for State maps. These enlarged homestead maps are only about 2 feet square and are on such a small scale that all you can observe on them, as a matter of fact, is the land that has been designated for entry under the enlarged homestead, which is shown by a deep red coloring.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the committee allowed all that is necessary for enlarged homestead maps. In view of the statement made by the Commissioner of Public Lands, the committee thought it was not warranted in making an appropriation for the purpose of printing State maps.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Why, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to the expenditure which was made under this appropriation in 1915. There were published in 1915 under this appropriation maps for four States only—6,500 copies of a map for Nevada, costing $320; 4,500 copies of a map of Arkansas, for $360; 4,500 copies of a map of Alabama, for $360; 6,000 copies of a map of Utah, $480. Now, the gentleman says that he does not think the committee ought to put in a proposition which would take from the great West this opportunity that they have had to get these maps from the National Government. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That the General Land Office published maps of Arkansas and Alabama, and, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said, they are now proposing to publish one in the State of Louisiana; so it is not a proposition which applies alone to the West. In other words, wherever there are a few acres of public land the Land Office can go ahead under this appropriation and, at the expense of the taxpayers all over the country——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). Publish a lot of maps for the use of that particular State.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman propose, because the Commissioner of the General Land Office made a mistake, if it was a mistake, that the people of the western country should be punished for it? The reason we need maps out there is because we want to settle up and develop that country, and——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, as I remember the hearing, stated that the only real purpose and object in printing these maps was for the convenience, as he stated, of the people of those States, and that they would be very much disappointed if they were not supplied with those maps. Now, the committee felt, under those circumstances, that there was not any necessity for printing those maps, that it was a waste of public money to make an appropriation for the printing of those maps.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman propose——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not blame the gentleman of those States. Of course, they would like to have those maps and send them out to their constituents, but I do think that under all the circumstances and in view of the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that it would be a useless and unnecessary appropriation and expense.

Mr. RAKER. Within the last two days, yesterday evening, I took this matter up with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he sends a letter up hoping that this will be put in so that these maps can be furnished and people have the use of them.

Now, the money that will be appropriated this time will go to printing maps for a part of the Western States, at least, to take the place of those that have been exhausted. The people have been in the habit of having them; they are wanting them; they are valuable. In addition to what the gentleman referred to, these land districts have been and are changed, and the rights of the people depend upon their certain conduct within the limits of a land-office territory.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I concede, of course, that the people would like to have them. They will be very much disappointed if they do not get them. For my part, I would like to have the National Government print maps of Tennessee, and the people of Tennessee would like very much to have me, as their Representative, and the other Representatives from Tennessee send them these maps; but I do not think it would be fair to the taxpayers of this country for the National Government to undertake to publish maps of Tennessee.

Mr. RAKER. If the State of Tennessee had public land and wanted to sell it and get revenue from it, these maps ought to be published.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the proposition, as I said a moment ago. The distribution of these maps is not confined to those States where there is so much public land.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the gentleman know that one of the most important bills before the Public Lands Committee during the session was as to public lands in his State?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are no public lands in my State. The gentleman states that the General Land Commissioner has changed his opinion. I insist upon the statement he made before the subcommittee and that appears in these hearings. And if my distinguished friend, and doubtless other distinguished gentlemen, has gone down and has been able to open his eyes so as to cause him to take another position in the matter, of course the committee is not to be held responsible for that. But the fact remains that the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his statement before the committee gave no reason, and undertook to give no reason, why these maps should be published.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether or not he would rather have the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office about a proposition of this kind than the opinion of the Representatives in Congress from the public-land States? I have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office stating that this appropriation should be restored.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and I have here, in the hearings, statements made by the General Land Commissioner, in which he failed to give any reason why they should be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. He was not informed. That was the reason.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He has been in the office for several years, and I am very much surprised to hear the gentleman state he is not informed.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. He was not acquainted with that particular question and the great demand for these State maps and the useful purpose they serve.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we appropriate, in the preceding item, $20,000 for a United States map, not really for use, but just for ornament and instruction, we having control of them and sending them out. And I dare say it is very seldom one of those maps falls into the hands of a man who uses it to obtain positive information about something that he wants to know. Out in the schoolhouses and in public places throughout the country they are undoubtedly somewhat useful. We appropriate very large sums of money every year for publishing the maps issued by the Geological Survey, and which we have great difficulty in getting rid of. I usually send mine to the department. I suppose they manage to dispose of them. I used to give my quota away years ago, sending the maps to people who did not want them and who probably threw them in the waste basket. I quit that.

Now, here is a proposition where people want maps to use. If a man wants to take up a homestead in the western country or in any way enter upon the public domain, if he happens to be a resident of the city of Chicago or some other place in the country, the first thing he wants is a map. He wants to know something. He can acquire that information only from a map of some kind. And it seems to me that while we appropriate $20,000 for maps for our own use and very large sums of money for a geological map we might properly and without the charge of extravagance appropriate $1,500 for the printing of maps which people want to use in order to enter upon the public domain with the intention of cultivating the soil and adding to the productivity of our country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Patent Office: Commissioner, $5,000; first assistant commissioner, $4,500; assistant commissioner, $3,500; chief clerk (who shall be qualified to act as principal examiner), $3,000; 5 law examiners, at $2,750 each; examiner of classification, $3,600; 5 examiners in chief, at $3,500 each; examiner of interferences, $2,700; examiners of trade-marks and designs—1, $2,700, first assistant $2,400, 6 assistants at $1,500 each; examiners—43 principals at $2,700 each, 86 first assistants at $2,400 each, 86 second assistants at $2,100 each, 86 third assistants at $1,800 each, 86 fourth assistants at $1,500 each; financial clerk, who shall give bonds in such amount as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, $2,250; librarian, who shall be qualified to act as an assistant examiner, $2,000; 6 chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; 3 assistant chiefs of divisions, at $1,800 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the commissioner, $1,800; translator of languages, $1,800; clerks—9 of class 4, 9 of class 3, 17 of class 2, 130 of class 1, 91 at $1,000 each; 3 skilled draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 4 draftsmen, at $1,000 each; 90 copyists; 50 copyists, at $720 each; 4 messengers; 25 assistant messengers; laborers—14 at $600 each, 42 at $540 each; 40 messenger boys, at $420 each; in all, $1,375,040.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I judge from an examination of the paragraph the committee followed exactly the recent law that was passed in reorganizing the office?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We did.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of professional and other reference books and publications and scientific books and expense of transporting publications of patents issued by the Patent Office to foreign Governments, $3,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in my time I ask that the following editorial from the Baltimore Sun of March 1, 1916, be read.

Mr. MANN. Why do you not ask that it be inserted?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted rather than to take up the time of the committee to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to insert the editorial referred to in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. It ought not to go into the body of this RECORD.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let it go. It applies right here.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the other day I made a similar request about a newspaper article, which was objected to, and I would like to couple my request with that of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Make your request separately. I did not object to it.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I did not say the gentleman did. I would like to get my newspaper article into the RECORD, too, but I am not objecting to his request. I reserved the right to object in order to make that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For professional and scientific books, law books, and books to complete broken sets, periodicals, directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the department, $1,000, of which sum $250 may be used "orthef" Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the language corrected. There is a typographical error.

Mr. SISSON. I offer an amendment in order to correct it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 101, in line 15, in lieu of the word "orthef," insert the words "for the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, $600; in all, $16,100.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:
On page 103, line 10, after the figures "$16,100," insert "South Dakota, surveyor general, $2,000; clerks, $3,100; contingent expenses, $500; in all, $5,600."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in former appropriation bills an appropriation of $5,600 for the surveyor general of the State of South Dakota has been included, and without much discussion before the committee it was omitted from this bill.

My amendment would appropriate the same amount that has hitherto been appropriated. The hearings are not very complete and give little information, although the estimates provided for this appropriation. A very short statement was made by Mr. Tallman when he appeared before the committee. In response to a question by Mr. STAFFORD——

Do you look forward to some of these offices being discontinued in the near future?—

Mr. Tallman stated:

There is one in South Dakota that could be discontinued now, except for the fact that there is a good deal of mineral surveying work to be done there, which is paid for by the applicants themselves. It costs for the maintenance of that office only about the amount of the surveyor general's salary. You understand that mineral surveys are made at the cost of the applicant, but the work is handled through this office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who provides the field force in those instances?

Mr. TALLMAN. For mineral surveys?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TALLMAN. The United States deputy surveyors constitute the field force. They are appointed by the surveyor general, but they are paid entirely by the person whose survey is made.

Mr. Tallman finally stated that there was not a great deal of necessity for this office in South Dakota, but that there was some necessity. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a little later in the Committee hearing, asked Mr. Tallman, with reference to the office in South Dakota:

Mr. BYRNS. With reference to the office in South Dakota, I understood at the hearings last year or the year before that there was very little work being done in that office, and it was expected that it would be discontinued?

Mr. TALLMAN. That is true. I have looked into that somewhat. I was just telling one member of your committee during your absence that there is quite a large amount of mineral surveying being done through that office that the Government does not have to pay for, except as it has to pay for the maintenance of the office. It is quite useful to the public out there to have that office maintained for a time longer, I think. There is considerable mineral surveying arising in the Black Hills.

Now, the nearest surveyor general's office to South Dakota would be that of Wyoming, and it would be practically impossible to take the office from South Dakota to Wyoming. If this office in South Dakota is abolished and this appropriation, only $5,600, is not made, it will be necessary to transfer the records to the city of Washington, and anyone having mineral survey work will be compelled to send here and be subjected to great inconvenience. There is a great deal of unsurveyed land in South Dakota, 513,000 acres, and there is practically no expense connected with the office. It is located at Huron, S. Dak., in the Federal building. There is no expense for office rent or janitor service. There are not many general employees, only one, a draftsman, and one chief clerk; just enough to carry on the work and make it a convenience to the people.

No showing for the discontinuance of this office has been made in the hearings. No fight was made for it or against it. It was just one of those things that was passed by without an argument being made. We feel that the appropriation should be continued. It is small. The settlers in that State who wish to file on unsurveyed public lands or who want mineral surveys should be cared for without their having to come or send to Washington. They should receive the same treatment that the people in other States receive.

There are six land offices in that State, and I will concede that as those land offices approach the completion of their work it might be advisable to abolish this office; but there is land still left, and mineral surveys must be made, and we think the appropriation should be continued.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the office referred to by the gentleman was considered last year when the matter was before the committee, but the statement was made at that time that it would be only a short time when they would complete the work. The committee came near to abolishing the office at that time, but decided to leave it, because if there was any necessity for it at all we did not want to inconvenience anybody with reference to the matter. Now, if you will read the hearings, you will find that Mr. Tallman says there is but little use for the office. On page 606 of the hearings you will find that he states that when this office is abolished the records will be turned over to the State and all the records will be kept in the State. He says the records they are now keeping there would be largely duplicates of the land records of the State, so that when the office is abolished the records will be turned over to the State.

As the gentleman from South Dakota stated, there are several land offices now in the State. The land has practically all been surveyed. As a matter of fact, there is still a small quantity of land down in my State of Mississippi that has never been taken, and there are a number of other States in the Union where they have small quantities of public land that has not yet been taken. The only excuse for keeping this office is the fact that they have mineral surveys going on there, but it is not necessary that the State should have the records and surveys kept there. The mineral surveys can continue and the result of the surveys can simply be turned over to the department here and duplicates kept in the State. Mr. Tallman says those records are almost entirely duplicates of what they have in his office, so that it makes a permanent record for the State. The land records have been about completed, and but for the mineral surveys the commissioner would recommend the abolition of the land offices.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Has the gentleman considered the fact that in hundreds of mineral claims there is no record in Washington in relation to them, because the rights are mere possessory rights? When these records go to the secretary of state's office——

Mr. SISSON. They do not go to the office of the Secretary of State. They would go to the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DILLON. The land records go to the office of the secretary of state in the State. He has no power in reference to these mineral claims. Is not that true?

Mr. SISSON. Except to keep the record.

Mr. DILLON. These records are not kept in that way. There are hundreds of mineral entries where there is not a scrap of paper in the city of Washington in reference to them.

Mr. SISSON. So far as I am concerned, I am not familiar with the exact method of making mineral surveys, because we do not have them in my State and I have no experience with them. But here we were basing our conclusions on the testimony of Mr. Tallman, who is in charge of this work, and upon the testimony of last year.

Mr. DILLON. I think the committee has entirely overlooked the possessory rights of claimants, and to discontinue this office will bring chaos into the situation, so far as mineral claims are concerned.

Mr. SISSON. This examination was pursued with some degree of interest by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and other members of the committee, and I am sure that if the discontinuance of this office would bring the chaos of which the gentleman speaks the commissioner would have stated to the committee that there would be chaos and confusion, but he did not state that.

Mr. DILLON. I do not think the matter was brought to his attention.

Mr. SISSON. He did not urge upon us the absolute necessity of keeping it. He said there was a certain amount of mineral surveying going on, and we suppose that gentleman knows what he is talking about. He has charge of the work. He did not speak of any chaos and confusion. On the contrary, he rather intimated that it would not be any serious disadvantage if the office should be discontinued. The year before he said the work would be cleaned up out there perhaps during the fiscal year, and now it looks to us as if it was a mere excuse to keep the thing going to say that the mineral surveys are going on.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the members of the committee to the confused conditions that would exist in case this office is abolished. No Secretary of the Interior and no Commissioner of the General Land Office has recommended the discontinuance of this office. In fact, they have made estimates for the continuance of the office, and this motion of my colleague puts into effect those estimates.

As many of you know, South Dakota ranks fourth among the States of the Union in the production of gold. It produces five times more gold than Oregon, five and one-half times more than Idaho, eleven times more than Washington, double the amount of Montana, and forty times more than Wyoming. It produces more gold by $500,000 than all of these States combined. The Black Hills country, a radius of 100 miles, has produced one-twentieth of all the gold produced in the United States and Territories since Columbus discovered America.

Mr. QUIN. Then, why are they trying to do away with this office?

Mr. DILLON. That is what I am trying to find out. South Dakota has produced one-eightieth of all the gold in the world since the discovery of America. Our people are very much interested in the mineral industry in the Black Hills, and I trust that this committee will not abolish this office without hearings upon this question. The commissioner, in a letter addressed to me, states that there are 513,000 acres of unsurveyed land in South Dakota at this time. Now, suppose you abolish this office, where do the records go? They are not sent to Washington. They are not deposited in the General Land Office at Washington. These mineral surveys rest upon possessory rights. A man stakes out his claim, takes possession of it, and makes proof that he has expended $100 a year. He may keep that going for 20 or 30 years. There is no limitation in these possessory rights, so far as he is concerned, except that he must make proof that he has expended $100 a year. He is not required to make final proof until he gets ready, and the General Land Office at Washington has no part of the records involving his possessory rights; the claimant may take out millions of dollars of gold without applying for a patent.

The records are in the surveyor's office and in the office of the register of deeds. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to the Federal statute providing when and how this office may be discontinued or abandoned, to show you that you would violate the statute in your attempt to abandon this office.

Section 2218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior shall take all the necessary measures for the completion of the surveys in the several surveying districts for which surveyors general have been or may be appointed at the earliest periods compatible with the purposes contemplated by law; and whenever the surveys and records of any such district are completed—

Are they completed when there are 513,000 acres unsurveyed? Are they completed when there is a demand for hundreds of mineral claims in that region of country?

And whenever the surveys and records of any such district are completed the surveyor general thereof shall be required to deliver over to the secretary of state of the respective States, including such surveys, or to such other officer as may be authorized to receive them, all the field notes, maps, records, and other papers appertaining to land titles within the same, and the office of surveyor general in every such district shall thereafter cease and be discontinued.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DILLON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DILLON. I want to say to the members of the committee that under this section the field notes, the records, and the files do not come to Washington for administration. They go to the secretary of state of the State, and the office of Surveyor General is absolutely abolished so far as the National Government is concerned. The administration then comes to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Under section 2219 he becomes the Surveyor General, but without records, except as to such claims as have been filed upon for purchase or where there have been patents issued. But that covers only a small fraction of the interests of those who have possessory rights upon those lands. Now, section 2220 provides:

Under the authority and direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office any deputy surveyor or other agent of the United States shall have free access to any such field notes—

Not in the office at Washington, but in the office of the secretary of state of the State—maps, records, and other papers for the purpose of making extracts therefrom or making copies thereof, without charge of any kind.

Now, I submit that when you abolish this office you put into confusion the mineral records in that section of country, a State that stands fourth in the production of gold in the United States.

These records remain there. Is it in the interest of economy to send your special agents there to make extracts and to make copies? I trust that this amendment may be allowed, and that if there is any effort to eliminate the Surveyor General's office in the State of South Dakota we will be given an opportunity to present our side of the case and to have hearings upon it in order that we may protect our rights. We want to protect those rights, even if it is without a cent of compensation from the National Government.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, there are three classes of work that come before the surveyor general's office in South Dakota; and in speaking of this work I speak advisedly and from personal knowledge, because for nearly two years I was one of the land-office officials in that State.

First, we have mineral entries, and that has been gone into quite thoroughly. A surveyor—or, we might say, a deputy surveyor—does the actual field work and certifies the record to the surveyor general. The cost of the field work is paid by the claimant, so that there is no expense to the Government from that. After the record is complete the surveyor general certifies the map or plat of this land to the land office, and thus we get the record into the land office. That is the way an official map or plat of the land embraced in a mineral entry gets into the land office. Under our practice mineral locations are not filed with the Federal Government. Mineral locations are filed in the register of deeds' office in the county in which the mineral location is, and only when the final survey is made under the surveyor general does the Land Department get the plat.

Then we have forest-reserve homesteads, and if you will consult the general forest-reserve homestead act you will find that forest-reserve homesteads are by metes and bounds, and there is in South Dakota a distinct survey for each homestead entry within a forest reserve. I can well understand why the Commissioner of the General Land Office did not have much to say with relation to the forest-reserve homesteads—in fact, nothing to say—because forest reserves are under the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of the Interior never hears of or sees a plat in connection with the forest-reserve homestead until the surveyor general certifies that plat to the Land Office.

Then we have a third kind of business for the Surveyor General. We still have in South Dakota a number of townships of unsurveyed land.

I say to you in all fairness, in all seriousness, this office ought not to be abolished—first, because of the mineral entries in the State; second, because of the forest-reserve homesteads in the State; and, third, because of the unsurveyed land in the State.

Gentlemen, the amendment is just the existing law, and it ought to remain as it is. South Dakota ought not to be deprived of an officer within her borders who can certify to these maps and plats without delay; we ought to be given the privilege of doing business as we have in the past, and not be compelled to wait three, four, five months, perchance a year, in sending these maps and plats down to the bureau in Washington to have them certified from here. Gentlemen, I hope for the best interest of the people of South Dakota, for the best interest of the public-land service, that this amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I am reasonably familiar with the situation in South Dakota. South Dakota is our neighbor, and when I am at home I live within 7 miles of the South Dakota line, and from my home I can look over into some unreserved, unsettled lands in South Dakota. Last year the Commissioner General of the Land Office referred in an offhand way that some time in the future it might be proper to abolish the office of surveyor general of South Dakota. A committee economically inclined, and properly so, recalled that statement and called the commissioner's attention to it, whereupon the commissioner said, "Well, by the way, when I said that I had evidently"—I am not quoting his exact words, but the substance—"overlooked the matter of the mineral surveys."

It so happens that in South Dakota the mineral-survey work is tremendously important. The Black Hills are growing, expanding, developing mineral regions where surveys are constantly being made. The commissioner seems also to have overlooked the forest reserves in South Dakota. A large amount of work must be done in connection with surveying out by metes and bounds the homesteads in the forest reserves.

There is a method provided by law for abolishing the office of surveyor general. I think the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] referred to a section of the Revised Statutes. It provides that the Secretary, when such conditions shall obtain as to the completion of surveys and settlements that the office may be properly closed, it may be closed and the records sent to the secretary of state. There should, of course, be a duplicate of these records sent to the General Land Office at Washington; or, in other words, there must be a transcript made of a large volume of the record. It is the duty of the Secretary, instead of suggesting the cutting off of the appropriation, when the time came, to abolish the office in a regular, logical way.

Now, it has not been closed. Why? There are four land offices in the State of South Dakota.

Mr. GANDY. If the gentleman will permit me, there are six.

Mr. MONDELL. Six; and never, so far as I can recall, have we ever closed a surveyor general's office in a State until the last land office had been closed, except in one or two cases in the South, where we have abolished the surveyor general's office by legislation and placed the duties on the officers in a land office in the State.

Section 2228 of the Revised Statutes provides that the President is authorized, in any case where he thinks the public interests may require it, to transfer the duties of the register and receiver in any district to the surveyor general of the State, and that is done until only one officer remains. And then we close the last land office, and later, after transfer of the records, making such transcripts as are necessary, close the office of the surveyor general. But to close the office of the surveyor general in this way is unheard of. If gentlemen will read through the statutes they will find in almost every case we have closed the surveyor general's office by statute. That is not essential; but the fact that we have done it indicates that after the Secretary had determined that the time had arrived which warranted the closing of the office, after securing sufficient appropriation to make the transfer, he generally suggested that the office be closed by statute. That is not necessary, but it has been the ordinary way. It would be utterly impossible in the remainder of this fiscal year to bring the work of this surveyor general's office to a close. The amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is but another illustration of the fact that once an office is created it is a mighty hard thing to get rid of it, even though it may appear that there is possibly some reason for eliminating it. In the case of the assay offices a good many Members of the House have felt that they could be easily abolished without any injury or injustice to the service, but it has never been done. What is the situation here? A year ago the General Land Commissioner stated to the committee that he believed he would be in a position to recommend the abolishment of the office of surveyor general in South Dakota this year. When asked about that he stated that he did make that statement, but that he did not think of the mineral surveys, but he made no contest of the matter and no earnest insistence, and stated that the work could be performed from the General Land Office here in the city of Washington without any injury to the service. It is just a proposition for the committee as to whether they will reestablish this office at an expense of $5,100 or will permit the work to be done from the General Land Office here and save that amount of money to the taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The use of the fund created by the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stats., 365), and the act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stats., 937), for office work in the surveyor generals' offices and in the General Land Office is extended for one year from June 30, 1916: Provided, That not to exceed $25,000 of this fund shall be used for the purposes above indicated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is a fund that was created by act of 1864.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It consists of deposits made by the railroads for surveying their land grants.

Mr. MANN. If they deposited the money, why is there any limitation on the amount to be expended?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is a limitation on what might be called the surplus of the fund now in the Treasury paid in by the railroads.

Mr. MANN. It is not a current deposit?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not a current deposit.

Mr. MANN. What is the fund up there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is a fund that was deposited by the railroads for the purpose of having their land surveyed. There is a surplus on hand.

Mr. MANN. To whom does the fund belong?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To the Government.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the Government has possession of it. Is it a fund that the Government holds in trust?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was paid to the Government for the purpose of having these lands surveyed, and I think I properly stated it when I said it belongs to the Government. There will be on hand June 30 about $16,000 of that fund remaining, and for the last few years Congress has been authorizing an expenditure of $25,000 from the fund for the purpose of providing for office work in the Land Office here.

Mr. MANN. I remember about the item last year, but I did not ask about it then because I thought probably there would be no one who would know anything about it, and I am confirmed in that opinion now.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Legislative expenses: For salaries of members, $21,600; mileage of members, $9,250; salaries of employees, $5,160; printing of laws, $4,000; rent of legislative halls and committee rooms, $2,000; stationary, supplies, printing of bills, reports, etc., $4,000; in all, $46,010, to be expended under the direction of the governor of Alaska.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As I recall it, there is a law fixing the expenditures that can be made in connection with the meeting of the legislature in Alaska. Does this strictly follow the provisions of the law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does. It is in accordance with the law.

Mr. MANN. I notice the language—be expended under the direction of the governor of Alaska.

Does that mean that when he approves the voucher that ends it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it has to be audited here in the Department of the Interior. The accounts are audited in the Department of the Interior. While expended under the direction of the governor——

Mr. MANN. Of course they are paid upon his approval.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Paid upon his approval, and the accounts are sent here for final audit and approval.

Mr. MANN. That is what I supposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Postmaster General: Postmaster General, $12,000; chief clerk, including $500 as superintendent of buildings, $4,000; private secretary $2,500; disbursing clerk, $2,250; bookkeeper and accountant, $1,800; 2 stenographers, at $1,600 each; appointment clerk, $2,000; assistant to chief clerk, $2,000; confidential clerk to Postmaster General, $2,000; chairman, board of inspection, $2,000; printing clerk, $1,800; clerks—4 of class 4, 5 of class 3 (1 transferred from Fourth Assistant's Office, 1 submitted as telegrapher at $1,400), 7 of class 2 (1 transferred from Division of Postmaster's Appointments and 1 from Second Assistant's Office, 2 transferred to First Assistant's Office and 1 to Third Assistant's Office, and 1 submitted as typewriter repairer at $1,200), 6 of class 1 (1 transferred from Second Assistant's Office and 1 submitted as telephone operator at $720), 1 $1,000 (1 transferred to Solicitor's Office), 8 at $900 each (1 transferred from Division of Inspectors, 1 from Solicitor's Office, 1 submitted as telephone operator at $720); telegrapher, $1,400; typewriter repairer, $1,200; 3 telephone switchboard operators; assistant telephone switchboard operator; messenger in charge of mails, $900; 3 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; pages—2 at $480 each, 3 at $360 each; engineer, $1,400; 8 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; electrician, $1,400; 2 assistant electricians, at $1,200 each; 3 dynamo tenders, at $900 each; fireman, who shall be a blacksmith, and fireman, who shall be a steam fitter, at $900 each; 10 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 15 firemen; carpenters—1 $1,200, 1 $1,000, 2 at $900 each; captain of the watch, $1,000; additional to 2 watchmen acting as lieutenant of watchmen, at $120 each; 22 watchmen; foreman of laborers, $800; 43 laborers; plumber, $900; awning maker, $900; female laborers—1 $540, 3 at $500 each, 5 at $480 each; 43 charwomen; in all, $191,450.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the word "typewriter" is wrongly spelled in line 23, page 106, and without objection the Clerk will correct the spelling.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Purchasing Agent: Purchasing agent, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 2 of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each, 1 $900; 2 assistant messengers; actual and necessary expenses of the purchasing agent while traveling on business of the department, $500; in all, $22,640.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My attention has been called to some language, beginning on page 106 and following along, which I think is surplusage and should not be in the permanent law. I question whether it is the intention to retain in permanent law such phraseology as is found in the parentheses. For instance, on page 106 we find the first instance, on line 18:

One transferred from Fouth Assistant's office, one submitted as telegrapher at $1,400.

One transferred from Division of Postmasters' Appointments and one from Second Assistant's office, two transferred to First Assistant's office and one to Third Assistant's office, and one submitted as typewriter repairer at $1,200.

That is merely explanatory, and I question whether it should be retained in the permanent act.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The only object of putting it in this bill is that Congress may keep track of these transfers, which are made this year for the first time. In the next bill, for the next fiscal year, it will be dropped out as permanent law, but it is always thought wise and has always been the custom when there have been reorganizations such as this, changes made from one bureau to another, to put it into the first bill, in order that Congress may have permanent record of the changes and that the committee may have before it next year exactly what was done. That has been the custom.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the chairman will agree that it is mere surplusage?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And encumbers the permanent statute?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is surplusage in the sense to which the gentleman refers, but it is done in order to keep track of these various changes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether it is good policy to pursue such a course in framing a permanent appropriation act. The members of the committee could be informed of these various provisions in the report and not in this way, but it is scattered through this item and I only call attention to it in view of the fact that it was called to my attention by another Member of the House. I question its propriety.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This department is in the process of reorganization. This is not intended for the present committee, but for the committee and clerks that may come afterwards in order that they may know exactly what has been done in reference to this reorganization and how it was brought about.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who first directed my attention to these numerous insertions, as to the meaning of the clause in lines 2 and 3, on page 108, "one submitted at $1,000." Of course, that is not illuminating to me, but it may be to the clerk of the committee. However, I question whether it is very illuminating even to the members of the committee without further explanation being made. It is clearly explanatory of the purpose of the Postmaster General, but I question whether it should be incorporated in the permanent enactment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It means a new place. The gentleman will notice on the page to which he refers that in the parentheses it is stated that one is transferred to the Postmaster General's office, one in lieu of one at $1,200, and one submitted at $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That item is in explanation of the eight at $900 each. One of these is transferred to the Postmaster General's office and one in lieu of one at $1,200, which is comprehensible, and one submitted at $1,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It simply means, as I stated, it is a new position. Under the old law there were 12 at $900 each. In this bill it is proposed to provide for eight at $900 each. Now this is simply placed in this bill to show what became of the other places; one to the Postmaster General's office, one in lieu of a clerk at $1,200, and the one submitted has been transferred to a new position at $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the point. The two previous clauses are understandable but "one submitted at $1,000," when you are only paying $900 and we are following the recommendation of the Postmaster General. However, I do not wish to press the matter; I thought perhaps I might get some explanation. It certainly is not understandable to me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, it simply means it is a transfer to another position at the salary specified.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should you say one at $1,000 when we are only authorizing them at $900. If we are authorizing eight at $1,000 each it would be understandable, but here we authorize eight at $900 and allow one at $1,000 where the Postmaster General estimates in toto. I will not press the inquiry further, as I do not desire to take up the time of the committee unless the gentleman has the information right at his finger's end.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will look at the bottom of page 107, it will be made plain to him. There are 13 clerks at $1,000 each. Then it is stated in parentheses "one in lieu of one at $900." He is dropped over here on page 108, and this is simply to explain that he has been dropped here and submitted at $1,000 and included in the 13 at $1,000 each.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Solicitor: Assistant attorneys—1 $2,750, 1 $2,500, 2 at $2,000 each; bond examiner, $2,500; law clerk, $1,800; clerks—3 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 5 of class 1 (1 transferred from Division of Postal Savings), 2 at $1,000 each (1 transferred from Postmaster General's office), 1 $900 (1 transferred from Division of Postal Savings and 1 transferred to Postmaster General's office); assistant messenger; in all, $37,370.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There are a great many changes that have been made in the office of the Postmaster General running all through these items. My understanding from the gentleman is that these are made in accordance with the report of the Bureau of Efficiency. Is the gentleman from Tennessee able to say what is the total increase or decrease in the administration under the Post Office Department growing out of these changes? I notice that some items are very materially different. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster has a reduction from $397,560 to $311,070, while the Assistant Postmaster General has a decided increase, as I recall, from $82,250 to $163,210. There are various changes. What I would like to know, if I can, is whether under the changes which the Bureau of Efficiency and Economy have proposed, that being a very able bureau, there results a decrease in appropriation or, as is usual, an increase in appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that as a result of this reorganization of the Post Office Department there is a reduction of 37 employees in the clerical force and a total reduction in the expense of the department of $42,615.

Mr. MANN. Now, does the gentleman say that commencing in this bill with the Post Office Department and running down to and including page 114, which carries the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, there is a reduction in appropriations in this bill below current law to the amount of $42,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and to the number of 37 employees.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am going over the figures again, because it does not look to me that way, although I do not doubt the gentleman's statement when he makes it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find if he will refer to the report submitted by the committee a detailed statement of these reductions on page 8 of the committee's report.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I do not think that is intelligible unless you go through the bill. What I want to know is whether the bill carries that much less money in the same items combined than the existing law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It actually carries that much less, and I am sure the gentleman will——

Mr. MANN. It is a mere mathematical computation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It actually carries a reduction from the present appropriation of $42,615 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is from the present appropriation. A great many of these places were not filled at any time during the present fiscal year, but we frequently find we have made appropriations larger than necessary and the Post Office Department never has employed all the persons in that department that it is authorized by law to employ.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, the Postmaster General states that it has not been his policy to fill any vacancies where they were not needed.

Mr. SISSON. I think, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Illinois wants to know how much the force has been reduced.

Mr. MANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not make any such inquiry.

Mr. SISSON. I beg your pardon, then. I totally misunderstood the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to know how much the appropriation had been reduced, and then I wanted to know how many of the force theoretically reduced have not been employed at all during the present fiscal year.

Mr. SISSON. I can answer that question partially here. The Postmaster General in his testimony said that "for 1916 we made a further reduction of 80 employees." Now, the——

Mr. MANN. Well, statements like that are just "glittering generalities," you know.

Mr. SISSON. Then he submits here, which the gentleman will find in the statement of the Postmaster General, an itemized list of the employees and the number that were deducted; but it is all at one place here in the testimony, and that is the reason I called attention to the 80 employees. Now, the Postmaster General in his testimony said, in reply to the following question:

What is the total reduction in expense?—

That is, for this year.

The total reduction is $144,940 a year by this reorganization.

Mr. MANN. That plainly is not the case as to the items carried in this bill, whatever the Postmaster General may have said.

Mr. SISSON. I have not verified that statement.

Mr. MANN. I have verified it enough to know that there is no reduction of $100,000 in the appropriations that we make for the Post Office Department, the clerical force, in the different offices of the Postmaster General and the four Assistant Postmasters General.

Mr. SISSON. Now, for this year——

Mr. MANN. For instance, suppose the Postmaster General says this is one of the results. I do not know, but I do not think it is. For contingent expenses they reduced the appropriation from $25,000 to $20,000. That reduction is made because they find they have not spent $25,000, and has nothing more to do with the reorganization of the service than the man in the moon. They have a reduction in the appropriation for the purchase, maintenance, hire, and exchange of horses, horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles from $3,425 to $2,500. It has nothing to do with the reorganization of the service. Possibly they do not want to buy any team this year. Whom they buy teams for, I know not. They have a reduction in the appropriation for telegraphing of from $5,000 to $4,500.

I commend the committee for cutting these off, if they have found they did not spend the money, but it has nothing to do with the reorganization. I am perfectly willing to give the Postmaster General credit, and anybody else credit, if they effect a reorganization that saves any money up there, and I have no doubt that has been the case. And I thought it might be interesting to know whether there was any saving in the department, and how much it was at least.

Mr. SISSON. The total saving, as I understand from the testimony of the Postmaster General, in his office, not in the total department, from the time he took charge of it down to the present time, is about $144,000. Now, for this year on this reorganization the Postmaster General says there is a net saving of $42,615 by virtue of the reorganization of this department under the recommendations of the Efficiency Board.

Mr. MANN. That of itself is a very creditable saving, I will say.

Mr. SISSON. And I am taking it for granted, of course, that the figures of the Post Office Department are correct, namely, $42,615.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office First Assistant Postmaster General: First Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; Division of Salaries and Allowances—superintendent $4,000, assistant superintendent $2,250; superintendent Division of Dead Letters, $2,500 (transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); Chief Division of Correspondence, $2,000; clerks—11 of class 4 (2 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office), 6 of class 3 (1 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office and 1 submitted at $1,400), 22 of class 2 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,600, 2 transferred from Postmaster General's office, 9 from Fourth Assistant's office, and 1 submitted at $1,200), 31 of class 1 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,400, 26 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, 3 submitted at $1,000 each, and 1 at $900), 22 at $1,000 each (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,200 each, 16 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, and 3 submitted at $900 each), 15 at $900 each (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,000 each, 1 in lieu of 1 at $1,200, 6 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, 2 submitted at $840 each, and 3 at $720 each); two messengers (2 in lieu of 2 at $900 each, 1 transferred from Division of City Delivery, and 1 submitted at $660); 6 assistant messengers (3 in lieu of 3 at $900 each, 2 transferred from Fouth Assistant's office); 7 laborers (1 in lieu of 1 at $840, 6 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); 3 pages, at $480 each (3 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); in all, $163,210.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph be considered in connection with the two following paragraphs, in order that I may offer an amendment which applies to all three of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this paragraph be considered in connection with the two succeeding paragraphs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Postmasters' Appointments: Superintendent, $3,000; 2 assistants, at $2,000 each; clerks—4 of class 4, 11 of class 3 (1 submitted at $1,200), 9 of class 2 (1 transferred to Postmaster General's office), 7 of class 1 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,600), 4 at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each; 2 messengers; in all, $60,280.

Division of City Delivery: Superintendent, $3,000; assistant superintendent, $2,000; clerks—3 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 7 of class 1 (1 submitted at $1,000), 5 at $1,000 each (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,200), 2 at $900 each (1 transferred from Division of Postal Savings and 1 submitted at $720); assistant messenger (in lieu of clerk at $900); in all, $28,520.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 109, strike out lines 4 to 26, inclusive, and on page 110, strike out lines 1 to 17, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"First Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; division of post-office service—superintendent, $4,000 (formerly superintendent of Division of Salaries and Allowances); assistant superintendent, $3,000 (formerly superintendent Division of City Delivery); assistant superintendent, $2,250 (formerly assistant superintendent Division of Salaries and Allowances); 2 assistant superintendents, $2,000 each (1 formerly assistant superintendent Division of City Delivery, 1 formerly superintendent Division of Miscellaneous Transportation, Second Assistant's office); Division of Postmasters' Appointments—superintendent, $3,000; 2 assistant superintendents, at $2,000 each; superintendent Division of Dead Letters, $2,500 (transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); chief Division of Correspondence, $2,000; clerks—17 of class 4 (2 transferred from Second Assistant's office, 2 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); 23 of class 3 (3 transferred from Second Assistant's office, 1 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, and 1 submitted at $1,400); 37 of class 2 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,600, 2 transferred from Postmaster General's office, 4 from Second Assistant's office, 9 from Fourth Assistant's office, and 1 submitted at $1,200); 50 of class 1 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,400, 5 transferred from Second Assistant's office, 26 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, 3 submitted at $1,000 each, and 1 at $900); 34 at $1,000 each (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,200 each, 3 transferred from Second Assistant's office, 16 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, and 3 submitted at $900 each); 20 at $900 each (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,000 each, one in lieu of 1 at $1,200, 1 transferred from Second Assistant's office, 6 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office, 2 submitted at $840 each, and 3 at $720 each); 4 messengers (2 in lieu of 2 at $900 each and 1 submitted at $660); 8 assistant messengers (3 in lieu of 3 at $900 each, 1 transferred from Second Assistant's office, 2 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); 7 laborers (1 in lieu of 1 at $840, 6 transferred from Fourth Assistant's office); 3 female laborers at $480 each (formerly pages in Fourth Assisstant's office); in all, $278,630."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. First, may I ask what is the reason for making this change? Did the Clerk correctly report this total of $278,620?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The total is $278,630.

Mr. MANN. What two paragraphs is this supposed to take the place of?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This amendment is intended to put under one division the Division of Postmasters' Appointments and the Division of City Delivery, and also it is proposed to merge the Division of Miscellaneous Transportation, now under the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and place them all under one general division, known as the Division of Post Office Service.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think he is asking a good deal of the House to agree to a proposition that changes totals and transfers everything around? So far as I know, I take the gentleman's statement for it that it does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. While it increases the appropriation under the First Assistant, it decreases the appropriation under the Second Assistant a corresponding amount.

Mr. MANN. It does not decrease it yet.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was going to say to the gentleman that I have another amendment that I wish to offer, which will decrease the Second Assistant's appropriation by $26,620.

I want to say to the gentleman, and also to the House, that this amendment was sent up to the committee on yesterday. I conferred with the members of the subcommittee in regard to it, and the clerk of the committee has been through it very carefully. It does not increase the appropriation at all. It does not add to anyone's salary or make any changes whatever, except by merging these two divisions that I have mentioned into one. I realize, of course, that it has been suddenly sprung here under the circumstances I have stated, and if there is to be any controversy in regard to it, then, in view of the circumstances, I am willing to withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. I am only trying to get information. It is an unusual thing, and of course the gentleman does not take exception to one asking for information under the circumstances.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; on the contrary, I am glad to have the gentleman ask for it if I can give it.

Mr. MANN. Under this item, as the gentleman offers it, all will come under the office of the Postmaster General in one paragraph?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. That will include, then, the Postmaster General's office, as carried in the bill, and also the Division of Postmasters' Appointments and the Division of City Delivery?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And what is now in the Second Assistant's office?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It includes the Division of Miscellaneous Transportation.

Mr. MANN. Where is that carried in the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. On page 110, at the bottom of the page, the third line from the bottom.

Mr. MANN. That is "Miscellaneous transportation, $2,000; clerks—13 of class 4, 22 of class 3 (one submitted at $1,200), 14 of class 2," and so forth.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. All those clerks are not under that division.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am trying to find out. That is what it says in the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Those clerks are all under the bureau of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MANN. I want to ascertain where those clerks are employed.

Mr. GOOD. The second amendment that the gentleman proposes to introduce will show how many clerks are intended to be carried.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it will show how many are to be appropriated for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The next amendment that I propose to offer will show the gentleman the clerks who are to be transferred.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, while he is examining his data, I will say that when this matter was first presented to my attention this morning I was under the impression that it was to provide for a consolidation of various divisions.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it is separating them.

Mr. STAFFORD. But on closer scrutiny of the amendment I find that the purpose is not to consolidate divisions so much as to consolidate under one item the clerical force in respective divisions and to give a new title to the Superintendent of Salaries and Allowances by calling him the "Superintendent of Post Office Service." Of course, as the gentleman knows, the department, under authority of law, transferred certain services which were heretofore performed by the Second Assistant Postmaster General—that is, the screen-wagon service, so far as city delivery is concerned—to the jurisdiction of the First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MANN. I can not see where it has been improved any by the transfer. We have never had such poor service in my town as we have had of late. It may be different out in Milwaukee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Inasmuch as that relates to the field service rather than to the departmental service, I do not want to go into it, except to admit that we have a service in Milwaukee that is much superior to that in Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Of course, they are really satisfied with poor service in Milwaukee. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the people of Chicago are not contented, even when they have a good thing.

Mr. MANN. We know when we have it, and we do not always get it in Milwaukee, either.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I look at the proposed amendment, there is no other increases of salary except those provided in the bill submitted to the House. There is merely a change of terminology as to one office and the bulking under one item of the various clerks, rather than dividing them under each division head.

Mr. MANN. We will get it so that we can not tell as well where the clerks are employed, of course.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It involves a transfer of clerks drawing $26,620 from the Second Assistant to the First Assistant, and then the appropriation under the Second Assistant, under the amendment I will offer if this is accepted, will be reduced to that extent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Postmaster General by this amendment is seeking to have all the clerical force attached to these three divisions—Salary and Allowances, and Postmasters' Appointments, and Dead Letters—bulked together under one item, so that he can transfer the clerical force to the respective divisions as the service requires, without being limited to the number assigned to any respective division?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely. It is proposed, and the order has already been signed by the Postmaster General, merging the work performed by this Division of Miscellaneous Transportation with the work performed by the Division of City Delivery.

The Division of Miscellaneous Transportation has now to do with the screen-wagon service, with the mail-messenger service, and with the pneumatic-tube service. The gentleman, of course, is aware that the Division of City Delivery has to do with the vehicle service of the Post Office in the various cities.

Mr. MANN. There is absolutely no relation between the two services.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. On the contrary, I think they are closely related.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not speak from experience; I do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, in addition to that, the Division of Salaries and Allowances—I am sure the gentleman from Illinois will concede this—and the Division of City Delivery are closely related. While one has to do with the clerks and employees within the post offices, the other has to do with the clerks and employees and business outside of the various post offices.

Mr. MANN. They are both under the First Assistant's office now. You do not change anything up there. Here is a division—I do not think it will make any special difference whether it is called a division in a separate paragraph or lumped in with something else, except that where it is carried as a separate paragraph you can tell what the cost is. They want to hide it, so that we can not tell what the cost is; and nobody will know what the cost is if the gentleman's amendment goes through.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The business performed by these divisions has to do with the post offices over the country, and communications have to be had with the postmasters from all these three divisions. Now, it is thought that by placing them here under the First Assistant, who necessarily has to sign all these communications, it will result in a more compact and a more efficient organization.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee would intentionally deceive himself. Certainly he will not be able to deceive me about it. The First Assistant Postmaster General, a very clever gentleman, wants to extend his authority. He has a little better pull with the Postmaster General than the Second Assistant. They are all grasping for authority. The First Assistant says, "I would like to have control of that thing." He has already got an increased appropriation of nearly $100,000 over last year by extending his authority, but still he is not satisfied. He wants to take something else, about which he knows nothing, and about which the Second Assistant Postmaster General in the past has had pretty fair knowledge. I am not disposed to stand in the way of the reorganization asked by the Post Office Department, but I have no doubt that I shall be criticizing them next year for a lot of mistakes which they will make in this way, just the same as gentlemen from the country districts have been criticizing them this year for a lot of crazy, foolish, insensate things they have been doing up there. If they insist upon a reorganization and we concede it to them because they ask for it and say that it is necessary, and the result is that because of their grasping disposition to get authority they injure the service, they ought not to have too tender hides when they are criticized for the foolishness they are going to commit, and which they are now committing, under the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only say to the gentleman that I hold in my hand a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General, which I desire to place in the RECORD, which is explanatory of these amendments that he has asked. The Postmaster General has asked this, and has requested him to present the matter on the ground that, if it is adopted, it will make a more compact, economical, and effective organization within the department, and will work for better efficiency. Now, the gentleman realizes that it would be a rather anomalous thing—the merging of this division of miscellaneous transportation having already been accomplished—to have one superintendent in the department reporting to another.

Mr. MANN. Here is this Division of Miscellaneous Transportation handling the things that it does, which has been in the Second Assistant Postmaster General's office ever since I have been a Member of Congress. Without any hearing, without any discussion of the subject, without any consideration at all by the committee, merely at the whim of one of the officials up there, it is proposed to change that service. No one here knows anything about it, not even the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who has charge of it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I confess to the gentleman that I have no particular knowledge, save the information furnished by this letter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had no opportunity to have it. It has not been before him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But I will state to the gentleman that the order merging this Division of Miscellaneous Transportation has been made already, to take effect July 1.

Mr. MANN. They have no authority to change the way that we make these appropriations. I do not think they can do it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, it will be carried under that appropriation, but I take it that the Postmaster General can shift his force from one bureau to another.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it may be that the Postmaster General could and would——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And he has undertaken to do it, effective July 1.

Mr. MANN. It may be that the Postmaster General could and would violate the law, and that the auditing officers would permit it, but it would be a violation of the law nevertheless. That is the reason they are asking for this. If they could violate the law with impunity, they would not care how we made the appropriations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. I yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert the letter of the First Assistant Postmaster General on this subject as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter of the First Assistant Postmaster General. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, March 3, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BYRNS: The Postmaster General has signed an order, effective July 1, 1916, transferring from the bureau of the Second Assistant to that of the First Assistant the Division of Miscellaneous Transportation, comprising the screen wagon, mail messenger, and pneumatic-tube services. The reorganization of the bureau of the First Assistant, due to the absorption of these services, makes it necessary to request certain changes in the designations of the supervisory positions mentioned in the two amendments attached hereto.

It is not contemplated that after July 1 the Division of Miscellaneous Transportation will remain an independent division, but be merged with that portion of the work of the Division of City Delivery that pertains to the handling of the vehicle service in cities and towns having city delivery service. It is quite apparent that the work of the Division of Salaries and Allowances and of the Division of City Delivery in the bureau of the First Assistant is very closely correlated; in fact, certain work of these two divisions is so interwoven that it has been found impracticable to separate same without loss of time and efficiency. These divisions handle the work of the service in post offices, the Division of Salaries and Allowances dealing with the work in the post office proper, including all clerks and supervisory employees, while the Division of City Delivery handles the work at post offices, so far as it relates to the treatment of the mails outside of the office, including special-delivery mail. Inasmuch as this work at post offices is all under one postmaster and communications from either division are necessarily addressed to him and signed by the First Assistant, it has been thought, after a careful study, that the only proper and effective way to handle the work is to consolidate them into one division, to be known as the Division of Post Office Service. The present superintendent of the Division of Salaries and Allowances would become superintendent of this new division at the same salary now received, the present superintendent of the Division of City Delivery would become assistant superintendent of the new division at his present salary, and the assistant superintendents of the Division of Salaries and Allowances and City Delivery would become assistant superintendents in charge of branches or sections of the work of the new division, as would also the present superintendent of the Division of Miscellaneous Transportation.

The two memoranda herewith in the form of proposed amendments to the bill would correct the complications to which attention is called and make a more compact, economical, and effective organization without any increase over the present amounts carried by the bill. The changes do increase the appropriation of the bureau of the first assistant from $252,010 to $278,630, an increase of $26,620, but the suggestions decrease the appropriation for the bureau of the second assistant from $141,910 to $115,290, effecting a corresponding decrease of $26,620.

The work of this bureau would be materially assisted through the adoption of these amendments, and I thank you in advance for your careful consideration of the same.

The suggestions contained in this letter meet with the approval of the Postmaster General.

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to say that under the law the Postmaster General has the authority to depute to the various divisions and bureau heads such character of work as he believes will be for the best interests of the Postal Service. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may be right in his position that the Postmaster General has not the authority to transfer a whole clerical force from one bureau to another, but there is no question as to his right and authority to transfer the work that is being performed by one bureau to another bureau, or to that of another Assistant Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Second Assistant Postmaster General: Second Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; Division of Railway Adjustments—superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,250; Division of Foreign Mails—superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,000; superintendent, Division of Miscellaneous Transportation, $2,000; clerks—13 of class 4, 22 of class 3 (1 submitted at $1,200), 14 of class 2 (1 transferred to Postmaster General's office and 3 submitted at $1,200 each), 15 of class 1 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,600, 3 in lieu of 3 at $1,400, 2 submitted at $1,000 each, and 1 at $900, 1 transferred to Postmaster General's office), 13 at $1,000 each (2 in lieu of 2 at $1,200 and 1 submitted at $900), 9 at $900 each (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,200 and 1 in lieu of 1 at $1,000); messenger in charge of mails, $900; 5 assistant messengers (1 in lieu of clerk, $900, transferred from Division of Railway Mail Service); page, $360; in all, $141,910.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

On page 110, strike out lines 19 to 25, inclusive, and on page 111, strike out lines 1 to 11, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Second Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; Division of Railway Adjustments—superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,250; Division of Foreign Mails—superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,000; clerks—11 of class 4 (2 transferred to First Assistant's office), 19 of class 3 (3 transferred to First Assistant's office and 1 submitted at $1,200), 10 of class 2 (1 transferred to Postmaster General's office, 4 transferred to First Assistant's office, and 3 submitted at $1,200), 10 of class 1 (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,600, 3 in lieu of 3 at $1,400, 1 transferred to Postmaster General's office, 5 transferred to First Assistant's office, 2 submitted at $1,000 each, and 1 at $900), 10 at $1,000 each (2 in lieu of 2 at $1,200, 3 transferred to First Assistant's office, and 1 submitted at $900), 8 at $900 each (1 in lieu of 1 at $1,200, 1 in lieu of 1 at $1,000, 1 transferred to First Assistant's office); messenger in charge of mails, $900; 4 assistant messengers (1 in lieu of clerk, $900, transferred from Division of Railway Mail Service, 1 transferred to First Assistant's office); page, $360; in all, $115,290."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Fourth Assistant Postmaster General: Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; Division of Rural Mails—superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,000, chief clerk $2,000; Division of Equipment and Supplies—superintendent $2,750; assistant superintendent $2,500 (formerly assistant superintendent, Division of Supplies), chief clerk $2,000; clerks—12 of class 4 (2 transferred to First Assistant's office), 24 of class 3 (1 transferred to Postmaster General's office, 1 to First Assistant's office, and 2 submitted at $1,200 each), 35 of class 2 (9 transferred to First Assistant's office and 3 submitted at $1,200 each), 53 of class 1 (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,400 each, 2 in lieu of 2 at $1,600 each, 3 submitted at $1,000 each, and 26 transferred to First Assistant's office), 40 at $1,000 each (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,200 each and 16 transferred to First Assistant's office), 17 at $900 each (6 transferred to First Assistant's office); skilled draftsmen—4 at $1,800 each, 6 at $1,600 each (2 in lieu of 2 at $1,400 each), 7 at $1,400 each (3 in lieu of 3 at $1,200 each and 2 submitted at $1,600 each), 4 at $1,200 each (2 in lieu of 2 at $1,000 each and 3 submitted at $1,400 each); map mounter, $1,200; assistant map mounter, $840; mechanic, $1,000; map copyists—4 at $1,000 each (2 submitted as skilled draftsmen at $1,200 each); 4 messengers; 8 assistant messengers (1 submitted at $660, 2 transferred to First Assistant's office); 21 laborers (1 in lieu of assistant messenger, 6 transferred to First Assistant's office, and 2 omitted); in all, $311,070.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this is not a considerable reduction from the appropriation of last year? As I understand, the appropriation of last year was about $397,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Three hundred and ninety-seven thousand five hundred and sixty dollars.

Mr. TOWNER. This constitutes a reduction, then, of about $86,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but it is brought about through transfers to the First Assistant's office.

Mr. TOWNER. I understood the gentleman to say the entire reduction in the Post Office Department under the bill was about $42,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A little more than $42,000.

Mr. TOWNER. All the reduction that is made is in the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office, and a great deal more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; there has been a rearrangement or a reorganization throughout the entire department. Much of the work has been transferred to the First Assistant, and some to the Third. As a result of the reorganization this saving of $42,000 has been made.

Mr. TOWNER. The saving in the Fourth Assistant's department alone is $86,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it may not mean that there has been a reduction of duties heretofore performed of $42,000, because the duties performed in the Fourth Assistant's office would be transferred. In other words, where two departments have jurisdiction over the same matter it is transferred so that the jurisdiction will be under one man instead of two. So it appears on the face there has been a reduction in the Fourth Assistant's office, but as a matter of fact, the clerk and the service rendered is transferred to some other, and the duties that devolved upon him now devolve upon somebody else.

Mr. TOWNER. Is there not a reduction in the force in the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office because of the transfer of the men? I understand there has been a considerable reduction. Is it not true also that because of the reorganization and dismissal and changes that have been made in regard to the rural service that this large reduction in the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office has been made?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not think this change has had anything to do with the rural service—not in the sense the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. TOWNER. Can the gentleman say that from personal knowledge?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think I can. I do not think this has anything to do with the changes of the rural service. Such could not possibly be the case. It could not have anything to do with it.

The gentleman asked how the reduction was made in the Fourth Assistant's office. The report shows that it was brought about in this way: One salaried position of $1,800 was created in order to equalize one of the clerks with the other clerks performing similar services. There are six salaries omitted, aggregating $6,410.

Mr. TOWNER. There are a good many more than that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am talking about the Fourth Assistant's office. There are eight salaries increased, aggregating $1,520. There are nine salaries reduced, aggregating $2,060. There were no transfers to the Fourth Assistant's office, but there were 73 transfers of clerks and employees out of the office, amounting to $81,340. That tells the whole story and history of this particular reduction in the Fourth Assistant's office.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand that; but this we do not know, and I do not think the gentleman can tell us, whether these numerous transfers of clerks from the Fourth Assistant's office to the First Assistant's office was because they were needed in the First Assistant's office and because they were not needed in the Fourth. It is a singular thing that the totals in the three other departments were increased $44,000 and that a reduction was made in the Fourth Assistant's division of $86,000. It is a singular thing that all these changes are made in the Fourth Assistant's office, which has charge of the rural service. It seems to me that it is a legitimate inference to draw that these reductions are all made in the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office because the Post Office Department and the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General himself does not think that he needs as much money or as many men in this constantly increasing department of the Government's service as is really needed in order to insure to the patrons of the rural routes satisfactory service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa, but he is slightly in error as to where all of this decrease comes, although from the figures given from the Fourth Assistant's office it might readily be assumed that the whole reduction was in that office. However, the Postal Savings Department reduction in the appropriation is from $210,740 to $161,120, a reduction in the neighborhood of $50,000, which is more than the total reduction in the bill for the various offices. My understanding is that from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office they have made some transfer of work to the First Assistant, but have they transferred any work from the Postal Savings System Division to any other division?

Mr. SISSON. No.

Mr. MANN. All the work that has been done in the Postal Savings Division is still to be done. How was the reduction in the Postal Savings System from $210,000 to $160,000 accomplished—by the introduction of machinery?

Mr. SISSON. By the introduction of machinery and by the reduction of the force and transfer to other departments.

Mr. MANN. The reduction of force has nothing to do with the decrease in the work.

Mr. SISSON. It might have something to do with the cost of the work.

Mr. MANN. We were assured by the gentleman who controls the bill that the whole amount carried in the bill was $42,000 over the amount carried in the current year; that was the result of good work done by the Bureau of Efficiency, which resulted in reorganization of the service. When we examine it, we find that $50,000 is cut off from the Postal Savings System and no transfer of any work and no reorganization of any work under that system, so that the balance of the reorganization, instead of effecting a practical reduction of $42,000, effects an increase in the appropriation of $10,000. I wondered whether it was possible under anyone to effect a reorganization in the interest of economy that did not add to the appropriations. I never have known it to be done, and it has not been done in this case.

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, there has been a net reduction in the office in Washington of forty-two thousand and odd dollars from the last year's appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly; and more than $50,000 reduction in the Postal Savings System caused by the introduction of machines in order to do automatic clerical work, and not a particle of that work taken out of the office and done by any other office. All that was done before and is still done there. They do it with fewer men, because they have introduced, very properly, the machines, but the balance of the office is increased in cost, and I am not saying that in criticism. The wonder to me is that the Post Office Department here does not increase more rapidly than it does in its expenses. I have no doubt that the very excellent Postmaster General endeavors to hold down the expenditures in his department as much as possible; but when even so good a bureau as the Bureau of Efficiency and Economy starts out to tell us how we have saved money by reorganization, and we examine into it and find that the reorganization has resulted in an increase instead of a decrease in the appropriations, the committee ought to be frank enough to tell us so.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that one entire service transferred from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office was the dead-letter office. I am not able to tell him what the dead-letter office costs and how many persons are there; there is no showing that I have been able to find here as to the exact number; but that work has been transferred. As to the net saving of the $42,000 due to this reorganization of the service, we ought to take into consideration the fact that the Postal Service is gradually increasing and the parcel post is increasing at great rapidity, and, notwithstanding the fact that the duties of the office have increased, instead of increasing the force and the expense this reorganization has resulted in a net decrease in the appropriation of forty-two thousand and odd dollars. Owing to the increased duties devolving upon the Postmaster General's office, by virtue of the increased business in mail matter, and especially the parcel post, he has been able by this reorganization to save $42,000, and if he had not made the reorganization, instead of having a saving of $42,000 in his office he might have had an increase of many thousand dollars in new employees to take charge of the increased work. So it does not matter in the administration of the service if a net result in reference to the postal savings bank should be fifty thousand and odd dollars by a reorganization of the service, if all that service is done and the people get the benefit of the increased amount of service rendered by the Post Office Department at a saving of $42,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, including purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices; street car tickets not exceeding $200; plumbing; floor coverings; postage stamps for correspondence addressed abroad which is not exempt under article 11 of the Rome convention of the Universal Postal Union, $30,000, of which sum not exceeding $3,985 may be expended for telephone service, and not exceeding $1,500 may be expended for law books, books of reference, railway guides, city directories, books necessary to conduct the business of the department; and repairs to department buildings, $30,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 115, line 23, the figures "$30,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 115, line 23, strike out "$30,000."

Mr. MANN. I would like to know whether that is necessary. It seems to be covered twice.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is an inadvertence; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Attorney General is authorized to enter into a contract for the lease of a modern fireproof office building for the use of the Department of Justice for a period not to exceed five years, renewable, at the option of the Government, for an additional period not exceeding five years, at an annual rental not exceeding $36,000 and at a rate per annum per square foot of available floor space not to exceed 36.3 cents.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the point of order at the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this is less than it will be necessary to conduct this department for during the next year. Anyone who has been down to this department will realize that the Attorney General's office is scattered around in three different buildings, and they came to the committee and wanted us to fix up an old stable, which, by the way, is of brick, in which they have stored many of the very valuable records and filed papers that are most valuable to litigants and to the Government. We did not feel that we ought to expend the $4,000 which I believe they asked for the repair of that stable, but we asked the department if they could have a building erected by some private individual which would give them ample floor space and enable them to concentrate their office in one building. They made the investigation. They have propositions which were presented to them, tentatively, that a building would be erected in accordance with plans and specifications satisfactory to the department for the money which we are now paying on their entering into a contract for five years at that amount of money. I do not believe any member of this committee who will go down to the Attorney General's office and go through that office will fail to find a most deplorable condition, both as to space and as to the condition of the building and of the records. Your committee felt that by entering into this contract it would not cost the Government a cent more, but would give them all the room they need and would provide a building suited to the conduct of the law business of the Government. In view of the fact that it would not cost the Government any more, and in view of the fact that they are in such a horrible condition—and I believe any of you who will go down there will find that is the condition—we favored the item. There is a proposition to construct a building for the Department of Justice, but in the nature of things it will take five or six years or longer than that before that building will be erected, in which will be housed all the legal departments of the Government.

So your committee felt it was in the interest of the right sort of economy to put these people in a sanitary building, in one suited to their business. A portion of this department is around on another street. There is a little cubby-hole that you have to go through in order to get into that residence that faces on a different street to that in front of the park, and in that portion of the building where they are keeping the records, which was formerly an old stable attached to this residence. There is great danger of fire, and your committee was unanimous in the thought that this was in the interest of good administration and economy.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the housing of the Department of Justice is entirely satisfactory; far from it. At one time I lived in the house where the Attorney General's office is, and I am quite familiar in it.

Mr. SISSON. When was that?

Mr. MANN. The first time I was in Congress——

Mr. SISSON. That has been a long time ago.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well——

Mr. SISSON. And the gentleman has made a distinguished career since then.

Mr. MANN. It does not seem so long. The housing of the office is not satisfactory; it has been increased in size. The Attorney General's office I know was not very much of an office even when I first came here, which is not so long ago.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is aware, of course, that the residence that faces on Fifteenth Street, I think it is, is separate and apart and there is an alley between that and the balance of the office.

Mr. MANN. Where?

Mr. SISSON. Fifteenth Street; part of the department faces on Fifteenth Street. There is a residence in there that is not connected at all with the balance of the building, and everything there is in two places——

Mr. MANN. I do not see that that cuts any special ice in the matter. I am not saying this is an ideal place. Every new Attorney General——

Mr. SISSON. I am sure the gentleman would not say that if he would go through it——

Mr. MANN. I expect I have been through there a great many more times than the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. Undoubtedly the gentleman has, but the gentleman did not go through with the idea of looking at the whole proposition at one time with a view of determining whether or not it would be economy and whether or not it would add to the efficiency of the department to get it all together where they would be in contact with each other.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt my friend knows better how I went through it than I do, but I did not go through it with the determination in advance——

Mr. SISSON. Neither did I.

Mr. MANN (continuing). As to what I would do. Well, I think the gentleman probably did.

Mr. SISSON. I am sure if the gentleman will not make that statement, if he would go down and go through that now with the idea in his mind that he is the Attorney General and that he wants a more efficient service and good offices and good light. That building was not intended as a public——

Mr. MANN. One of the troubles with my friend from Mississippi is that he will not let anybody else make a statement that he is interested in.

Mr. SISSON. I am sure I will yield to the gentleman because he has the floor. I will not interrupt him until he has finished.

Mr. MANN. I have not had a chance to make a statement yet at all. I have no doubt the gentleman is full of this information; I have no doubt he is full of indignation after going through the Attorney General's office. Each new Attorney General for a good many years when he first gets into the office has had a spasm, insisting that he must have a new building, and maybe that is the reason they go on the Supreme Bench, I do not know. Several of them have gone on the Supreme Bench from that office. Maybe they quit the Attorney General's office because they did not like the surroundings. The surroundings are not the best. Each new one thinks that it is awful down there. Well, it is pretty bad. Now, if they have to store their records in a stable that is a very good reason why the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should provide in this city a proper hall of records where public records can be stored with safety.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. They will not build any new building where the records will be safe from fire. The private buildings that we have had put up are not safe from fire and the records in them are not safe from fire. If you want a building where the records can not burn, build a fireproof hall of records. This is not the only item in this bill of this kind. There is one here and one for the Department of Labor.

Mr. STERLING. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. MANN. Why, doubtless in each case they want a fine, new building. There are a lot of Members of the House here now who a few years ago considered themselves mighty lucky indeed to have the Government provide an office for them who now want two or three rooms. They have not got space enough. When we provided the House Office Building in the first instance Members held their breath for fear the country would condemn them for providing an office at public expense. Now they are insisting that they ought to have more room; everybody gets the habit.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to both gentlemen if I get the time, but I will now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask my colleague if he knows what the status of the movement is for this new building for the Law Department, and what it is intended to include?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is intended to include the Department of Justice; but as to the exact status at the present time I can not tell my colleague.

Mr. STERLING. The Supreme Court?

Mr. MANN. No; not the Supreme Court.

Mr. STERLING. The law library?

Mr. MANN. Not the law library.

Mr. STERLING. It does seem to me there ought to be something done on behalf of the Department of Justice. I agree with the gentleman that the place is not fit for an office of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Why, it is a private dwelling turned into an office. The people thought they were millionaires who lived in this building a few years ago. There is nothing the matter with that building; it is one of the finest mansions in Washington. Wealthy people built the building and lived in it; but, of course, it is not an ideal place for an office. The rooms are not entirely suitable. In one place you have got to go up a few steps to get from one level of the floor to the same level on the same floor, and that is an awful thing to do. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. MANN. I will yield the floor.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, a great many records are in this office, in what they call the stable, which is a brick building—it is not an undesirable sort of a building to look at, I will state; a very nice building—but it was formerly used as a stable. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, as I am going to address my remarks to him——

Mr. MANN. I am listening to my friend.

Mr. SISSON. In order to see if I can not get him to withdraw his objection.

Now, this will not cost the Government a penny more than we are now paying. We are now paying $36,000 a year rent on these old buildings. Now, we will be compelled to keep the Department of Justice there in these buildings at least for five years longer, because you can not possibly have a public building authorized and completed and ready for occupancy within the five years. But in addition to that the chances are that within the five years we will still have to be in the same quarters or have some new building. Now, the department wanted $4,000, and asked the committee for $4,000 to make some repairs on the building, and especially to repair the department there in which they have these records, which is the old stable, and those records could not be put in a department of records if you had it ready, because those are the live records in the office, in which litigants are interested, and live records on the various dockets in the various courts, that have found their way in the process of litigation into the office of the Attorney General. Those records are alive, and when they are useless they might be put into a department of records and classified properly. But those records they have now are the records of litigants or records of criminal prosecution, and are valuable for present and ready use, and are kept there at the Attorney General's office for that purpose. Now, it is unquestionably true that those people are suffering great inconvenience. Many of those rooms are poorly lighted. The department is scattered in three different residences there and in the stable where they keep the records.

Now, for $36,000, the amount of money carried in this bill, they are informed, in reply to a proposition they had made to a reliable concern, they will erect a building convenient to the Capitol, convenient to the department, convenient to the public, so that for $36,000 within the next current year they will have a building ready for occupancy, and they will move out of their present quarters and not cost the Government one penny more than we are now paying. And, in addition to that, we will save what will be compelled to be put on, either here or in the Senate, some three or four thousand dollars to improve these old structures in which they are now doing business.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has been any authorization for an appropriation for a new building for the Department of Justice?

Mr. SISSON. There was an authorization for the Department of State, but I am not sure whether there was any for the Department of Justice in the public buildings bill or not. My impression is that there was not.

Mr. STERLING. Has any site been selected for it?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Government for several years has owned and still owns the property in which the Poli Theater is located, and from there straight through to the Mall, down Fifteenth Street. Plans were advertised for and received for a Department of Justice building, to be located on the square next south of the square on which the Poli Theater is located, and to be erected on a line parallel with the front of the District of Columbia Building. Those plans I saw in the Treasury Department. That site was bought for the express purpose of putting up a Department of Justice building and other departments, which the gentleman from Illinois will recall——

Mr. MANN. The State and Commerce Departments.

Mr. STERLING. Is there any provision for a Supreme Court building?

Mr. SISSON. I thought the gentleman's question was whether it had been authorized by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STERLING. By Congress.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so. There has been no authorization for this building.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a further interruption?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I understand it—and I think the gentleman from Illinois will know the facts—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is now considering the proposition to build a Department of Justice building.

Mr. SISSON. That is true, I think. I hear that from the members of the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And that will include the Attorney General's office?

Mr. SISSON. Of course. But it will be five or six years before it is completed. If you would authorize that building in this bill—I mean this year—until the time you got your plans and specifications prepared and the building erected the Department of Justice here would have to continue to transact business, and it is absolutely necessary for this Congress either to appropriate something like $40,000 this year in order to do the necessary and needed repairs there, or we will have to take the $36,000 to pay the rent next year of a new building. Now, they have proposed to get this building ready for occupancy if the bill passes within the next two or three months within a month or six weeks or two months after the 1st of July, so that in the latter part of the summer or the first of the fall the Department of Justice could occupy the building.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. MANN. What rent do we pay now for those buildings that are now occupied there opposite the square?

Mr. SISSON. Thirty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that we pay $12,000 a year almost for each of the three buildings there?

Mr. SISSON. That was the appropriation last year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is 4 per cent on $900,000.

Mr. MANN. That is a good deal more than I would want to pay for the rent of those buildings.

Mr. SISSON. And all the offices are not in those three buildings. They have some offices in the Southern Building and in the Bond Building. In other words, the Department of Justice is scattered all over town pretty generally.

Mr. MANN. Their work is scattered around, but lots of their work has no correlation with other work of the department.

Mr. SISSON. They do not have the room, and so they have been asking the Appropriation Committee to give them additional sums of money to rent additional quarters in other portions of the city.

Mr. MANN. Now, I have great confidence in my friend from Mississippi, and I would like to ask him a question and would like a square answer if it will not embarrass him. Does the gentleman from Mississippi think that if we provide for this building we will get a new Department of Justice Building in the next generation?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman means the new building?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I do. I do not believe that you are necessarily preventing Congress——

Mr. MANN. Well, while the gentleman has expressed his opinion, I do not so believe.

Mr. SISSON. I think if this building is left alone you simply punish the people who occupy it. You have the department scattered all over the town, and for that reason I feel that with the same amount of money that we are now paying for rent for the three residences that we have there and for the other two or three office buildings we have in the city elsewhere, if we could get it all together under one roof we would have greater economy, they would have better office room and be able to do more efficient work, and you could reduce your messenger force to go from one part of the department to another, and the amount, of course, that you could necessarily reduce would certainly be more than would compensate us for the $4,000 that we will have to pay as additional money to improve the buildings in which they are now located.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think I understand the gentleman. Are we paying $36,000 for the three residence buildings north of the square, or for all the space occupied by the Department of Justice?

Mr. SISSON. For all the space occupied by the Attorney General's Office. Now they propose to concentrate all the floor space they need in one building.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. In the accounts I have seen about erecting the new building for the Department of Justice the cost has been placed at $3,000,000, if my recollection is correct. The interest on $3,000,000 would be only 1.2 per cent to get the amount of rent we are now paying.

Mr. SISSON. I will state to the gentleman that that building is to be a building in which the supreme court, as well as all other courts in the District, will be located. That will concentrate all the legal department, including the Supreme Court and the other courts, in one building.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. It has never been contemplated that the Supreme Court would be located in that building.

Mr. SISSON. There is a proposition to build a Supreme Court building over here——

Mr. MANN. There was a proposition some years ago to build a Supreme Court building across from the Library of Congress, but the members of the Supreme Court indicated their desire not to be separated from the Capitol Building.

Mr. SISSON. Everything is tentative up to date, until the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds brings in its bill. I hope the gentleman will not make his point of order.

Mr. MANN. That is a natural hope.

Mr. SISSON. Because I do not believe the gentleman's good judgment will dictate to him that we will in five years get a Government building for the department, and I do not believe the Congress will be in the least particle deterred from building this Department of Justice structure if you let these people have what they ought to have for six years.

Mr. OGLESBY. Viewed from the standpoint of economy, it would be better if the erection of the new Department of Justice building were deferred and we continued to pay rent.

Mr. SISSON. I have nothing further to submit, Mr. Chairman, except that we thought that if we could get the department into one building without added expense it would commend itself to the entire membership of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with all these gentlemen who want better quarters, and I do not defend the quarters which the Department of Justice now has. I occupy an office myself in the Capitol Building, by the grace of the minority and the provision of the majority, and no one has ever heard me complain about it. If I wanted to complain I would leave it instead of talking about it. I have to shrink in order to get between the wall and my desk, to get behind my desk, but I do not complain of it. My room, if it were in the Department of Justice, would be one of the poorest rooms they have. I am mighty glad to have what I have got. I am perfectly willing to stay there until we have a majority in the House. [Laughter.] Then I hope some gentleman on that side of the House will be equally satisfied with the room. I am not complaining. Gentlemen frequently say to me, "Why, is this all the room you have got?" I say, "I am thankful to have this. There is plenty of room here to do business. That is all I want."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the Department of Justice, I wish to say that they were asking for $4,000 to improve the stable, and the proposition came from the committee, because we could get for $36,000 the quarters that they have there now and save the $4,000. The proposition came from the committee and not from the department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with his usual alertness, has reserved a point of order on this proposition, and I hope he will make it. I feel quite sure that he will.

The proposition is to pay for the accommodation of the Attorney General's office a yearly rental of $36,000. That is at the rate of 4 per cent on $900,000. Now, there is far from a $900,000 investment represented in the quarters for which we pay $36,000 rent.

But this is not all. I call attention also to a provision on page 143 of the bill, as follows:

The Secretary of Labor is authorized to enter into a contract for the lease of a modern fireproof building for the use of the Department of Labor for a period not to exceed five years, renewable, at the option of the Government, for an additional period not exceeding five years, at an annual rental not exceeding $24,000, and at a rate per annum per square foot of available floor space not to exceed 36.3 cents.

That is at the rate of 4 per cent on $600,000, to accommodate the Department of Labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the committee about a little experience that I had two or three years ago in one of the departments in this city. I was consulting with a bureau chief about the bureau, and suddenly to my surprise he mentioned the name of a well-known lobbyist in this city, who, he said, had been in his office several times urging the chief to go before a committee of Congress and set forth the necessity of a new building for his bureau. He said, "I will put it up, or have it put up, and rent it to the Government." He named the sum at which he would rent it. I said to the bureau chief, "Was there anything in it for you if you had made the recommendation?" He laughed, and replied, "Mr. COOPER, he did not make an out-and-out proposition, but knowing the man, and observing the way he looked and talked, I think there would have been something if I had agreed to it."

Why are we paying 4 per cent on $900,000 for quarters for the Attorney General's office? I want to ask here if there is anything else in the Department of Justice except the Attorney General's Office?

Mr. SISSON. The Attorney General's office and the Assistant Attorneys General. They are scattered all over the city.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are these all that are included in the Department of Justice?

Mr. SISSON. I think that is all that is provided for in this particular item of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who knows everything about the Government of the United States——

Mr. MANN. I do not plead guilty to that at all. Of course, it is all under the Attorney General; but there is a detective bureau, and there are a great many bureaus under the Attorney General. There is an Assistant Attorney General in charge of claims, who has no relation with any other work of the office.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was to be included in the Department of Justice building on the site now owned by the Government and purchased for that express purpose?

Mr. MANN. All the work of the Attorney General's office except these solicitors of the various departments, who are required to be in the departments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But they are under the Attorney General.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, of course, I acquit the committee of even the slightest complicity in any scheme of that kind, but this whole arrangement is in keeping with the well-known system in this city, which succeeds in keeping the United States Government paying about $700,000 a year rent for buildings—a system which has obtained here altogether too long. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] only two or three years ago called attention to the fact that one of the employees in the Department of Commerce was interested in one of the buildings put up for and rented to that department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois called attention to that on the floor of the House. The statement which I am about to make is in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. He says that unless we pass this appropriation for $36,000 the Department of Justice must stay in the quarters which it now occupies. But I observe that there is no time specified for the completion of the building which it is proposed to rent. This would authorize the Attorney General to enter into a contract for the erection of a building, would it not?

Mr. SISSON. It would.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With no date set for the beginning or the completion of the building. He could enter into a contract for its completion two or three years from now.

Mr. SISSON. He would have no place to go if he did not get it completed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He could stay where he is now.

Mr. SISSON. He has a right to discontinue that contract on 30 days' notice.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But this new building is not to be completed within five years. That is, there is no requirement of law that it shall be.

Mr. SISSON. The one that we authorize here?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, this building that we authorize here is to be completed within this fiscal year—this office building.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is no requirement of law to that effect, is there? There is no such limitation in this bill?

Mr. SISSON. There is no such requirement in this bill, except that he is authorized to enter into a contract; and if the Attorney General, having no place to go, is cut out of the quarters where he now is, his only recourse will be to get this building completed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly; but does the gentleman say that a building that would bring, and ought to bring, a rental of $36,000 a year could be completed in one year?

Mr. SISSON. That is the report that is given to the subcommittee by the chief clerk of the Attorney General's office, who conferred with the gentlemen who made the proposition to him. I do not even know who they are.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that $900,000 is going to be expended on any building for that purpose?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think $900,000 will be expended. And another thing, I have no more sympathy with what is going on in this respect than has the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I believe that.

Mr. SISSON. But we are not confronted with a theory. We are confronted with a fact—a condition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; and the fact is that we are paying an outrageous rental to house the office of the Attorney General.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit me, we will have to do that anyway. We can not get away from it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know, and the Government never will in this way—never so long as you propose to have a building constructed and agree in advance to pay $36,000 rental a year.

Mr. SISSON. On the contrary, I am trying to save $4,000 a year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order? If he does not, I will.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Solicitor of the Treasury: Solicitor, $5,000; Assistant Solicitor, who shall also act as chief clerk, $3,000; 1 law clerk, $2,000; 2 docket clerks, at $2,000 each; clerks—2 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 2 of class 2; assistant messenger; laborer; in all, $24,980.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to the language in line 17—

Who shall also act as chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. GOOD. That it is new legislation, that it changes existing law, and adds new responsibilities.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By virtue of this language the salary of the chief clerk has been eliminated. That was $2,000. That has been cut out of the bill through the transfer of the duties to the assistant solicitor. I think under the Holman rule it is in order.

Mr. GOOD. It is true that you drop out the chief clerk, but it was not necessary to prescribe what officer should perform the duties of the chief clerk. That might be performed by any other clerk.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the proposition recommended by the committee is clearly within the purview of the Holman rule, clause 21, which provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

What does the provision do? We eliminate and combine an office with that of the solicitor. It is within the clause that I have just read, and I contend that it is in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I always come to the discussion of the Holman rule with a good deal of uncertainty. There is a precedent that seems to me might be in point.

The Chair will find on page 96 of the bill, under the Patent Office, "chief clerk, who shall be qualified to act as principal examiner." It is almost the identical proposition with the one now before the House, which is "assistant solicitor, who shall also act as chief clerk."

Two or three years ago my colleague from Illinois, Mr. Fowler—I think it was; I am not sure—but somebody made a point of order on that provision, "who shall be qualified to act as principal examiner," and the point of order was sustained. I made a point of order on the whole language, which was also sustained. That accounts for the language still being in the bill. I struck out the office entirely; but after this language had been stricken out it was all restored through a Senate amendment. But to the extent it goes, it seems to me, it is a precedent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, for he has great respect for the gentleman's opinion on matters touching parliamentary law.

Mr. MANN. And, I hope, on some others——

The CHAIRMAN. And some others. Under the Holman rule it is in order to legislate on appropriation bills by adopting germane legislation, and one of the ways is by reducing the number of employees and persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman's opinion as to whether the abolition of the office of chief clerk, doing away with the office and putting the duties on the assistant solicitor, comes within the purview of that rule?

Mr. MANN. That is a matter, Mr. Chairman, which I suggested when I first addressed the Chair, because I did not have a decided opinion upon it. But there was this precedent, and I thought I ought to call the attention of the Chair to it. I confess that I would not know how to rule if I was in the chair.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is proper for the Chair to consider this language, not in connection with the other items of the bill, but as it stands alone. The question the Chair must pass upon is whether the adoption of this particular language would result in the reduction of expenditures or cause the elimination of some of the offices. It must appear clearly to the Chair that the insertion of this language can not of its own force bring that result. We will not reduce expenditures by providing that the assistant solicitor shall also act as chief clerk. In and of itself the putting upon the assistant solicitor the duties of chief clerk does not eliminate the chief clerk, and how is it possible for the Chair to determine from this language that the chief clerk will be eliminated? In other words, this language of itself will not result in a reduction. It must afterwards be decided whether a chief clerk will be eliminated.

The law is changed here by the imposing of additional duties upon the assistant solicitor. Certainly there can be no question but that this is new legislation. There is no authority which sanctions the claim that because you impose additional duties on one officer you will necessarily eliminate another. In order to be within the rule the new provision must go out unless it, on its face and in and of itself, will result in a reduction. There is no authority for believing or guessing that it is probable that if this language is adopted other action will be taken that will effect a reduction.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is so vital to this section of the bill that the Chair ought to have until Monday to consider it. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to do it, but in view of the fact that this is Saturday afternoon, that it is 20 minutes of 5 o'clock, that it will take half an hour to call the roll, and that we have been in session since 10 o'clock this morning, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is sick, and has asked me to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof which the chairman of the committee may appoint, be, and the same hereby is, empowered to investigate and inquire into the condition of the financial relations between the District of Columbia and the United States, as well as to the correctness of the books and accounts relative thereto, whether those books or accounts be kept by the United States or by the District of Columbia.

Said committee hereby is empowered, further, to examine and investigate the books and accounts of any officer or employee (past or present) of the District of Columbia, or of any other person having business dealings or transactions with the District of Columbia.

And said committee hereby is empowered, further, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct, acts, omissions, and doings of any officer or employee (past or present) of the District of Columbia.

And said committee hereby is empowered, further, to inquire into and investigate the books, accounts, and affairs of any public utility or common carrier doing business or operating in the District of Columbia, including any ice manufacturer, any market-house company or corporation, any market company, any taxicab or motor-vehicle company, the Washington Terminal Co., any cold-storage or warehouse company, and any person, company, or corporation dealing in meats or other provisions in the District of Columbia.

For the purposes above set out the said committee is hereby empowered, in its discretion, to send for and compel the attendance of persons and the production of books and papers before it; and the chairman, or acting chairman, may administer oaths or affirmations.

The sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, hereby is appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House in order that this resolution may be put into effect. Said committee or subcommittee, as the case may be, is empowered to sit during the sessions of Congress, or during the recesses between sessions of Congress, and may employ stenographers and accountants, who shall be paid out of said $10,000 upon vouchers signed by the chairman or acting chairman of said committee and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not understand anything about this proposition. It is one of those things that properly goes to the Committee on Accounts, and it seems to me the right thing to do would be to refer this resolution to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. It appears that this resolution was introduced in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. ROUSE. That is the same resolution under which the committee is now working.

Mr. MANN. It has not been introduced in this House at all?

Mr. ROUSE. No; it has not been introduced.

Mr. LLOYD. All the gentleman needs to do is to introduce it and refer it to the Committee on Accounts. We can have a meeting on Monday morning, and there will be no time lost by having it so referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what committee is to make that investigation?

Mr. ROUSE. The Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has this resolution come from any committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not see any reason why it should not be dropped into the basket and take the ordinary course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Kentucky that he put it into the basket, and it will be referred.

RAILWAY MAIL PAY.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Pittsburgh, addressed to me.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the subject of the letter?

Mr. MORIN. It is an answer to some remarks made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] when the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration.

Mr. MANN. It is not harmful nor long.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Pittsburgh, February 24, 1916.

Hon. JOHN M. MORIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Chairman JOHN A. MOON, of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House, in connection with the hearing of the railway-mail pay bill is reported to have expressed himself to the effect that the resolutions sent in on this subject by commercial organizations were of a stereotyped nature and adopted through railroad influence.

This is certainly not true in regard to the expression of the action of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh. Our resolutions were presented by the committee on postal affairs, composed of 15 members, but 1 of whom is connected with a railroad.

At the meeting of the chamber at which they were adopted, December 23, 1915, our record of attendance of 125 members present shows not more than a half dozen men connected with the railroads present.

This chamber is a deliberative body. All the subjects upon which action is proposed are bulletined to the membership in advance, so that there is full opportunity for study and the exercise of the best judgment.

Yours, very truly,

LOGAN MCKEE, Secretary.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture, reported the bill (H. R. 12717) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1917, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report (No. 296), ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order.

ARMED MERCHANTMEN.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Upon what subject?

Mr. PLATT. By inserting a brief statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] on international law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does it have reference to the particular matters that are now agitating the House?

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, March 5, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, Infinite source of life and its far-reaching purposes, we thank Thee that when our souls are overwhelmed with grief at the passing of our loved ones from the now to the then that time assuages our sorrows, but that their memory still lives in our hearts. We are met on this holy Sabbath day in memory of one who finished the work Thou gavest him to do, and who has passed on into the realms of the great beyond. We thank Thee for his activities, and the deeds he wrought, for the confidence he inspired which gave him a well-earned place in the hearts of his countrymen, the place he made for himself on the floor of this House; a wise counselor, an earnest advocate of what seemed best for his people, his State, and his Nation; for the affection he inspired in his home. May we cherish his memory and strive to emulate his virtues. And now, O God, our Father, let the peace which passeth understanding possess our hearts and the hearts of his many devoted friends; especially let that spirit abide with the bereaved wife and loving children, that they may look forward with us to the larger life, where we shall dwell with our loved ones forever, and we shall praise and glorify Thy name in the spirit of Him who taught us the life everlasting. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be postponed until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. VENABLE, by unanimous consent, ordered that Sunday, March 5, 1916, be set apart for tributes upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 157.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON, late a Member of this House from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, November 24, 1915, there died in the city of Meridian, Miss., the Hon. SAMUEL ANDREW WITHERSPOON, formerly a Member of this body.

We have met to-day to bear some tribute to the excellences of his character and the merits of his work.

It is a pity doubtless, but it is nevertheless true, that during the life of any man the conflict of views, partisanship of opinion, and the emotionalism aroused by warring contentions often obscure the view and cover worthy qualities with a veil. But how different is death. This wonderful magician with the same wand that calls the spirit home removes the veil and we see clearly as never before the noble lineaments of a worthy character and the nobility of a great heart. In the presence of death differences of opinion take a minor rôle and we stand uncovered before the great truth that truly achievement consists in character; that truth, courage, honor and honesty, and kindliness are the primary things and that the positions that these qualities led one to assume are of secondary importance. In view of this truth, I am sure that every Member of this body can and does bear sincere tribute to his memory, regardless of whether his views upon public questions were in accord with theirs or not.

Mr. WITHERSPOON was the son of Dr. Elias Bourdenot and Mrs. Elizabeth Dowd Witherspoon and was born in Lownes County, Miss., near the town of Columbus, on May 4, 1855. He lost his father in early youth, and his mother removed with the family to Oxford, Miss., in 1872 in order that she might place her sons in the State university at that place.

He graduated in 1876 from this institution with the degree of bachelor of arts, also taking afterwards the degree of master of arts and bachelor of laws. After his graduation he was a member of the faculty for some time in the capacity of tutor of Latin and it was during this time that he pursued his further literary and law courses. In 1879 he removed to Meridian, Miss., where he continued to reside until his death and where he pursued his profession until his election to Congress, at which time he retired from the practice of law and devoted all of his time and thought to this service.

Mr. WITHERSPOON was one of the foremost lawyers of his State and his learning, with his remarkable powers of analysis and his rare gift of clear and lucid statement, won him a reputation second to none in his own State and one which extended beyond its borders.

For 30 years he labored in his profession and there manifested the qualities of mind and heart that made him respected by all and beloved by those who were so fortunate as to be placed in a position to learn the real kindliness of his spirit.

His was the philosophic mind and he labored day and night with unflagging zeal to master the great principles upon which the law is founded. He constantly searched for reasons and he did not rest until he felt that he had discovered one sufficient to support his conclusion or the conclusion of the writer of opinion or text, as the case might be. This course of study constantly pursued made him a resourceful and powerful debater at the bar, and his wonderful gift of lucid and logical statement made him most formidable before the jury. This gift of logic together with his remarkable memory enabled him to marshal his facts in such an orderly way and with such natural sequence, real or apparent, depending upon the merits of his case, that his conclusions seemed to follow often as an inevitable consequence.

As a lawyer I can pay him no higher compliment than to say that when he was right his positions were impregnable and when he was on the wrong side of a question, as all lawyers will be at times, he could well-nigh force reason to adopt the wrong. If there was error in his position or conclusion it was rarely found in his processes of reasoning but was found lurking in some premise, which he himself believed in and which he had persuaded others to admit by a clearness and plausibleness of statement that I have rarely seen equaled and I believe never excelled.

He was a man of strong feeling and any cause he espoused became his from the standpoint of personal feeling as well as that of relation, with the result that his whole mind and heart and emotions became involved. He believed his causes just, and hence each contest became a contest between the right and the wrong, and the battle was to him a crusader's fight to snatch the Holy Grail of Truth from the impious hands of Error. From this cause and from the inherent honesty of the man which would not let him be false to his best efforts, he spared no labor in his researches for material with which to barricade against the assaults of what he believed to be Error, and he toiled indefatigably forging the weapons with which to destroy it.

He had the strong man's confidence in his own powers, and having once assumed a position he clung to it and defended it with all the gallantry and fervor of a knight errant, never admitting defeat until the last recourse of the warrior had been exhausted.

He sprang from a distinguished American family as his name indicated, but with this went no hauteur. He was never heard to mention anything which would indicate a false pride in anything. He was most democratic in spirit. Human values to him were measured in terms of service and character. He was most successful in his later professional life. He must have been conscious of his powers and his achievements. His practice yielded him handsome returns for his efforts and honors came to him with the years, but the fundamental democratic character of his character remained. His sympathies went out to the poor and the lowly, and manhood and not dollars excited his admiration.

He believed in the old-time simplicity of things and viewed with real alarm certain modern social tendencies which are the outgrowth of wealth and leisure which has come to certain of our people.

He believed that there was a virtue in the soil of honesty, strength, and simplicity which was infused in those sons of earth who relied directly upon her for support, and he desired to promote the interests of the farm, making it attractive and prosperous not only because he had a real sympathy and kindly feeling with and toward the farmers of the Nation as a class, but also because he felt that the farm was the great-man factory of the Nation, the great reservoir from which the Nation must in the future draw its man power. As I have heard him say, he loved the man of the fields, who rendered an honest equivalent to Nature for her store; who learned patience in waiting and toiling from the planting in the spring until the reaping in the fall; whose wants were the simple ones of Nature and not the accretions of perverse habit.

He was democratic in spirit and a lover of humankind. He looked upon his fellows as his brethren and felt that they should share with some degree of equality in a common inheritance. He believed that the great differences that he perceived in the situations of men were largely due to dishonest practices and unjust laws, and toward these he manifested the greatest indignation. His nature was intense and his indignation at what he thought was wrong or unjust found its natural expression in strong terms. The casual acquaintance might have drawn the conclusion that his nature held a degree of bitterness. His intimates knew that it held only sweetness and a love of mankind and his vehemence arose not from gall but from goodness, not from the littleness of spite but from the bigness of a great indignation toward what he believed to be the wrong.

Independence of character was a predominant characteristic. Conscious of his own powers and self-reliant to a degree, he followed his mental conclusions with conduct based thereon. There was nothing of the Hamlet in him. His mental processes were not for mere subjective pleasure or profit but were designed as the predicates for action and according to them he shaped his course. Having reached his conclusions, he cared but little who opposed and still less for the possible results upon his personal, professional, or political fortunes. He never learned "to bend the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift might follow fauning." The poor and lowly received at his hands more earnest services in the courts, if such was possible, than did the powerful and influential and this, too, regardless of the influence of the persons who opposed. Both in his professional life and in politics he was independent in conduct and in character.

The qualities that I have described are peculiarly those of the advocate and in this department of work he especially shone. With a broad knowledge of the principles of law, a perfectly trained mind and memory, simplicity of style, and a thorough knowledge of the facts of his case, combined with ardency of feeling, he was a dangerous antagonist to encounter and a pillar of strength to those associated with him.

Mr. WITHERSPOON was at heart a very affectionate man. No other could have won the affectionate title of "Uncle Sam" from his associates in this body.

When preparing for battle, as he was most of the time, with his energies concentrated upon the advocacy of what he believed to be correct and his mental powers concentrated upon the mastery of the question in hand, he may have, at times, seemed impatient or harsh with those who invaded with outside matters the domain of his thoughts or retarded the movements of his reasoning with things he deemed immaterial, yet always at heart he was genial and kind and in those moments when cares were cast aside he reflected both in speech and manner the real kindliness of his spirit.

I can not describe this quality of the man better than by quoting an excerpt from the address of Hon. E. H. Dial of Meridian, Miss., delivered before the Lauderdale County Bar Association in respect and tribute to his life-long friend. Mr. Dial said:

> Only a very short time before he entered the sleep of death—his condition supposed at the time to be greatly improved—a cooing babe, his infant grandson, of whom he was passionately fond, was taken into his room and held near him that he might feast his soul a while in communion with this innocent loved one of his heart. The two there, each the idol of the other, held love's sweet converse in language of their own—almost the last earthly communion of his soul with soul; for in an incredibly short time thereafter the Great Reaper came. Thus, this strong man, who never quailed from fronting in fierce combat giants full panoplied and worthy of his steel, found his last sensation of earthly joy in drinking love-light from a baby's eyes.

He was great in his mental strength, great in his moral courage and great in his honesty, and great in his services. He achieved much and exampled more. He received nothing in life as a gift of capricious fortune or fortuitous chance, but with courage and faith he lived in accordance with the laws of the cause and result of achievement and paid the price for what he gained to the last farthing. He bought mental strength and culture with labor, the respect of men with honesty, the admiration of men with a kind of desperate courage, and lastly the love of men with a love for them and grief for his death with all of these.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep sorrow that I heard of the sudden death of the splendid man and useful legislator to whose virtues of life and able services in this body we have to-day met to pay tribute.

Mr. WITHERSPOON and I were fellow members of the Committee on Naval Affairs during his two terms of service in this body—the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses; and as we were in almost continuous session during these two Congresses, I saw a great deal of him during those four years. I thus had an opportunity to know him well and to appreciate his many sterling qualities.

A warm feeling of regard grew up between us. He was by instinct a gentleman, courteous to everyone, true and loyal, high-minded and sincere. He was one of those staneh, steadfast men who tread the paths of duty with unfaltering step. Quiet of manner, calm of speech, but with the spirit of the bonne camaraderie fully developed—the very soul of kindliness and gentleness in his personal relations—there is small wonder that he made friends in every walk of life.

He seemed to care nothing for that flattery which stirs the blood of the small and swells the pride of the little. He was a scholar by education and inclination, and pursued his chosen profession of the law without seemingly a thought of holding office until called to service in this body.

He was wholly devoted to the interests of his constituents and to his work in Congress. He had the courage of his convictions and the talent to stoutly defend them with force, logic and eloquence. In debate he was terse and vigorous, yet fully regardful of the amenities.

Mr. Speaker, two men may differ—very widely differ—even reaching to the extremes of thought and action on national policies, both wholly sincere, prompted by the purest patriotism, each eager for service in pressing his belief to success in legislation, yet they may entertain for each other the warmest personal friendship and the sincerest appreciation. This was the position in which Mr. WITHERSPOON and I found ourselves. We differed widely in our views regarding the appropriations for the Navy, and in fact in the naval program generally. But in our personal relations that difference of opinion never had the slightest effect.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it was Plutarch who said:

> Man is a plant, not fixed in the earth, not immovable, but heavenly; whose head, rising as it were from a root upward, is turned toward Heaven.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, at a special meeting of the Lauderdale County Bar Association held in the city of Meridian, Miss., Friday, November 26, 1915, a committee, composed of E. H. Dial, W. E. Baskin, and F. V. Brahan, was appointed to prepare and report resolutions on the life and character of Hon. SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON, deceased, Representative in Congress at the time of his death from the fifth congressional district of Mississippi and a member of the above-named association, who died at his home in the city of Meridian, Wednesday, November 24, 1915. The resolutions prepared by the committee were submitted to a called meeting of the bar association Saturday, December 11, 1915, and were unanimously adopted. Pending the motion to adopt, Hon. E. H. Dial, chairman of the committee, formerly a law partner of Mr. WITHERSPOON, delivered an exhaustive eulogy on the life and character of the deceased, which, together with the resolutions, were ordered spread upon the records of the association.

The following are the resolutions by the Lauderdale County Bar Association, adopted Saturday, December 11, 1915:

> Whereas, on Wednesday, November 24, 1915, there died in the city of Meridian, Miss., a distinguished member of this association, the Hon. SAMUEL ANDREW WITHERSPOON, a man widely esteemed both as a public and private citizen; and
> Whereas, we, his neighbors and personal friends, desire to place on record our estimate of his worth: Therefore be it
> Resolved, by the Lauderdale County Bar Association, that we, through this means, give expression to our appreciation of his admirable character and to our sorrow at the loss his family, his friends, and the public have sustained by reason of his untimely death.

SAMUEL ANDREW WITHERSPOON, son of Dr. Elias Bourdenot Witherspoon and Elizabeth Dowd Witherspoon, was born in Lowndes County, Miss., near Columbus, May 4, 1855, and in his early youth attended the common schools of the country neighborhood in which he lived. His father died when he was quite young, after which his mother, with a determination to educate him and two other younger sons, moved to Oxford, Miss., in 1872, where she could secure for them the educational advantages afforded by the State University at that place. He entered the University of Mississippi as a student in the preparatory department in October of 1872, and was graduated with second honors from that institution in June, 1876, with the class at that time known as the Centennial Class.

After his graduation he was for a while tutor of Latin in the university, during which time he pursued the study of law. He moved to Meridian in 1879, where he that year began the practice of law. By close application and earnest effort he advanced steadily, through a period of 36 years, to a foremost place among the lawyers of Mississippi, his reputation as an able lawyer having, some years before his death, come to be recognized in circles far beyond the limits of his native State. He was a bold and skillful advocate, honest and reliable, and throughout his whole career eminently successful in the conduct of his causes.

To his preeminent ability as a lawyer was added the profound learning of the scholar. He adorned all things that he touched. All subjects that engaged his attention received new light, and his penetration discovered new and hidden truths. Too often the lawyer is learned only in his profession, but he garnered a full store of useful learning in the wide and varied field of intellectual endeavor, and brought to the dry and prosaic learning of the law the refreshing graces of belles-lettres.

His eloquence was "logic on fire." He was the John C. Calhoun type of orator, indulging rarely in metaphor or flights of fancy; but the statement of a proposition clear as crystal and the inexorable demonstration of its correctness was his peculiar forte. Concede his major proposition and the conclusion was inescapable. He may have been wrong in his premises, but his conclusions were always logically drawn.

He was elected to represent the Fifth Congressional District of Mississippi in the lower branch of the Federal Congress in 1910, and was serving his third term at the time of his death. He proved himself to be in this new sphere that same indefatigable worker he had always been in his pursuit of the legal profession. He grasped readily the great and essential elements of statecraft and came to be recognized as one whose thoughts and ideals were worthy of the traditions of his party and of the nation. Intensely democratic, unquestionably loyal to his State and his constituents, yet his intense patriotism carried his vision to the greatness of the Nation as a whole.

Champion of the ideas of State rights, he felt that the safety and perpetuity of the Nation were assured only through a veneration of and an unimpaired adherence to the Constitution. He revered that Constitution, and any attack upon it was an attack upon the very heart and vitals of our institutions. It was largely his championship of the principles of that great instrument that won for him his nation-wide reputation. His oration on the flag is a classic.

He was never a timeserver. Tenaciously loyal to principle, he never deviated from the path which the light of his own convictions illumined. His abhorrence of every kind of graft or double-dealing was so pronounced that its very presence was a challenge to combat. He believed that men should be true to their political trusts, and nothing went unchallenged with him that did not carry the password of rectitude, truth, and sincerity. His honesty and integrity might well be the ideals for every public servant. These are his enduring monuments.

He was emphatically at war with all measures that seemed to him conceived or likely to operate in the interest of the few against the many. His sympathies were at all times with those classes that fall apparently of a fair deal in the hurrying, ever-moving, ever-changing conditions of life, and as their champion he never shrank from dashing into the fiercest part of any fight that involved their interests and their happiness.

The influence of his life was ever on the side of morality and religion. He was a sincere and practical Christian. Since his early manhood he had been a church officer, and gave no small share of his time and thought to work of the church to which he belonged.

He was a good friend and neighbor, beloved by those who knew him well and with whom he had formed intimate relations of friendship, recognized by them as one whose life had been of value to this community, a joy to those whom it closely touched, a benediction to his family and friends.

He was a faithful, gentle, and loving husband, a devoted and indulgent father. To the grief-stricken wife who had walked hand in hand with him since his early manhood, to his son, an honored member of this association, to his two daughters, and to a devoted brother, surviving loved ones, we beg leave to tender our sincere sympathies.

Resolved further, That the presiding officer of this meeting appoint a committee of three to present these resolutions to the circuit court of this county at its next sitting, with the request that they be spread upon the minutes of the court, that they be recorded upon the record book of this association, a copy of them presented to the family of the deceased, and that the newspapers of this city be requested to publish them.

E. H. DIAL, Chairman,
W. E. BASKIN,
F. V. BRAHAN,
Committee.

In presenting the resolutions the following is the memorial address delivered by E. H. Dial before the Lauderdale County Bar Association Saturday, December 11, 1915:

Mr. President and members of the bar association, in presenting these resolutions in behalf of the committee, I beg the privilege of adding a few remarks expressive of my own personal estimate of the man whose life and character the resolutions are to commemorate.

SAMUEL ANDREW WITHERSPOON, son of Dr. Elias Bourdenot Witherspoon and Elizabeth Dowd Witherspoon, was born in Lowndes County, Miss., near Columbus, May 4, 1855, and died in Meridian, Miss., November 24, 1915, aged 60 years, 6 months, and 20 days.

He lived heroically the three score years allotted him and filled that span of time with thoughts and acts that made for the enrichment of his own soul and the good of human kind. He was an extraordinary youth, an extraordinary young man, an extraordinary character in middle life, a man of marked and transcendent ability in his riper years. In one of the stages of his career was his a genius that blazed with meteoric light. What he was at every step along his triumphant march from the country shoolhouse in the county of his birth to the National Capitol in the city of Washington was the product of a brave heart and of mental toil honestly and intelligently applied for life's noblest ends.

At no point in his career did he enjoy advancement through influence derived from some other's success before him or through favoritism of another in whom was lodged some temporary power; but toward his goal, which at the outset lay beyond a wilderness of difficulties, he, step by step, patiently and laboriously hewed his own way.

From his boyhood days he exhibited an intellect of exceptional strength, a mind of rare logical bent, of almost amazing analytical powers, a disposition and determination to master every subject that claimed his attention, a devotion to principle and loyalty to his own convictions that marked him, even in early life, as one of adamantine courage. These were predominant elements in his character from his youth up—throughout his whole life, from the days when he was a shoolboy to the years when he was a lawyer in his office, in the courts, and in the councils of the Nation.

I had known him longer than any member of this bar—longer than any person in Meridian, except one or two. I was intimately associated with him in quite a number of relations since he was 17 years old. We were companions before either of us was grown. We were college mates at the State University from 1872 to 1876, and were graduated together from that institution in the latter year in the class known at that time as the "Centennial Class." It was during these four years that a mutual friendship was formed between us that lasted unbroken interrupted by none of life's jars and conflicting interests, through a period of 44 years.

When I was married in another city in 1879 he, according to custom, accompanied me and stood with me, an interested participant as "best friend," during the ceremony. We were associated as partners in the practice of law in this city nine years, from 1879 to 1888. In all the political aspirations indulged by either of us neither ever asked the other for his support and influence. It was simply claimed as a matter of course without the asking, and neither of us ever thought of doing otherwise than contributing in fullest measure possible what aid he could to the advancement of the other's interest. We were officers in the same capacity in the same church for at least 30 years and have worked together with others many an hour, day and night, in furtherance of those particular church interests that claimed our time and efforts. We were boys together, young men together, middle-aged men together, and, though of late with no business associations to unite us, have nevertheless remained together in intimate friendship since time commenced to touch our locks with gray, until the hour his spirit quit its earthly tenement and went to rest.

Knowing him thoroughly, knowing his weaknesses and his strength, I testify to you that he was always all that he pretended to be, all that his friends and admirers thought he was—a high-born, honest man, strong, self-reliant, brave, reliable, learned, conscientious, religious, sincere, friendly, unostentatious, in sympathy always with humanity's common mass, whose knee bent to no being but his God.

His was a lovable nature, marred by only one defect that glared, of which he seemed to be oblivious—a disposition to irritableness, an abruptness of manner, that displayed itself sometimes, more strikingly in later years, without due cause, toward those he liked and even loved, as well as toward those he had no special interest in. Rub this out, and there was left little else than virtues on virtues piled by which to measure him. In conversation yesterday, a friend who had known him a long time, remarked that his nature was so open, transparent, and sincere that it might be likened to clean, clear glass held up, through which the sunlight pouring revealed alike its perfections and its flaws.

As a student at college he showed the same studious traits that characterized him in his maturer years as a lawyer and statesman under your own observation. He was always a hard student. He studied every subject thoroughly. He was thorough in his college textbooks just as he was thorough in his law books. He stood high in his class, graduating second in a class of 16, and with a notable record for his full course of four years. He was anniversarian in 1876 of the literary society of which he was a member, in that day one of the highest and most coveted of the college honors. The oration he delivered on that occasion bore the same marks that have characterized all the other addresses you have heard him deliver—logical in the flow of its thoughts and extremely metaphysical. I have heard discourses often since then from minds much maturer than his was at that time on practically the same subject—"The Pursuit of Happiness, the True Object of Life"—and have as often thought that none presented with greater force and convincing clearness than did his the truth which his subject announced. In the last year of his college course, 1876, he was winner of the prize offered by the Shakespeare Society of London for excellence in examination in Shakespeare's plays.

For two or three years after his graduation he was a member of the university faculty as tutor, or assistant professor of Latin. On completion of a post-graduate course pursued during these years he was awarded the degree of Master of Arts. Later, in 1908, the honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by the university.

In June, 1880, he was married in the city of Memphis to Miss Sue E. May, of Springfield, Ky., who survives him. Of the children born to them, three are living and grown to manhood and womanhood—Samuel A. Witherspoon, jr., a practicing lawyer at this bar, at one time his father's partner, an honored member of this association; and Misses Letitia and Fannie May Witherspoon, two of Meridian's most cultivated women.

In pursuance of a wish indulged by both of us during our college days, Mr. Witherspoon in 1879, prior to his marriage, came to Meridian to live and to join me in the practice of the law. He arrived here a total stranger in a town that was strange and new to him, but one or two persons in it whose names he knew. Often have I heard him describe the forlorn feeling that possessed him on the hour of his arrival as he looked about him at his unfamiliar surroundings and at the unfamiliar forms and faces that passed him by unnoticed, and how he wondered if it were possible for him ever to get a client out of that hurrying, indifferent mass of humanity at that hour so oblivious of his existence. His description of that memorable hour when he was so painfully conscious of his obscurity, and when his life's work lay untouched all before him came vividly back to my memory week before last, 36 years later, after that work was finished, when his cold, pulseless body, untenanted by the spirit that once had animated it, lay underneath a mound of flowers wet with the tears of scores of friends and admirers whom he, by his own intrinsic worth, had won and made to love him.

Well do I remember his first appearance in the circuit court. It was in a murder case. Almost any time lawyers already initiated, waiting about the court room, likewise spectators, will listen for a while through curiosity, or through some sort of interest and sympathy as well, to the first efforts of a novice in the law. The same sort of indifferent interest gained him attention at the outset in the trial of this case. Before it ended, lawyers, judge, jury, and spectators were amazed at the immaculate skill with which he was handling the witnesses and listening with wonderment at the masterful reasoning and powers of analysis being displayed before the jury in his disposal of the facts and his application of the law which the court had given in charge. The word went round, in effect, that a young David was in the Valley of Askelon, and the Goliaths of the bar, after that occasion, took most respectful notice always of the new stripling and his sling.

He was a most laborious student during all the years of his practice at the bar. When his practice was small he studied hard all the time. He studied the law night and day as a science. He toiled to master its fundamental principles. He studied, in season and out of season, the textbooks, the State code and legislative acts, and the decisions of the courts, especially the decisions of our own supreme court—not merely on the subjects applicable to cases immediately in hand, but he studied all these systematically without reference to any immediate need he had for them. He was satisfied with nothing short of thoroughness. He did not follow the law as a trade, an occupation out of which to make money, but pursued it as a high and honorable profession calling for the noblest powers of the mind and soul.

We all know, without rehearsing them, the results of this thorough, systematic, early preparation. We know he was a profound lawyer, whose accurate knowledge of the law had come to be, nearly two decades before his death, universally recognized and conceded by the profession, by the courts, and by the general public, and that he commanded a large and lucrative practice.

A predominant quality of his mind was its analytical powers. He was severely analytical and logical. Everything in his way seemed to go down before the logical sweep of his reasoning; and the bulwark he could build in support of a proposition he was endeavoring to establish seemed impregnable, whether in the argument of a point of law before a court, in the assembling of facts and law before a jury, or in the presentation of a subject, political, literary, or otherwise, before a promiscuous audience.

Another mental quality that characterized him was his sincere conviction of the rightfulness of the cause in which he was enlisted. He believed sincerely and strongly always that his side of a case was the right side. Thoroughly convinced as he always was of the righteousness of his client's claims, he would, even in the preparation of a case, grow impatient of a suggestion from any source that any flaw could possibly be found in it. He himself could see so readily a way around every possible opposition the moment it was suggested that he sometimes could not withhold a show of impatience that a mind less acute than his own would permit itself to be disturbed by a thing which to him seemed so unsubstantial. I doubt not that many who have been associated with him in the preparation of causes have noted this disposition of his mind.

A few years ago he abandoned law for politics. At the time of his death he was Member of Congress from the fifth congressional district of Mississippi, serving his third term. He went into politics, I think, because he had a laudable ambition to serve his country in a sphere the law did not afford. Besides being a good lawyer, he was a man of culture and general scholarly attainments. He had thought and studied a great deal on the theory and history of governments, and entertained deep-set convictions with respect to our national affairs. He was a lover of liberty, a friend of the oppressed. He despised favoritism in any garb. Having himself begun his life work with no help but his own native resources, his sympathies were all with people who labor and toil, with that vast multitude of the human family who live and move and have their being in life's humbler walks; and when he died, these, all these—all who do not bask in the light of fair Fortune's smiles, whoever and wherever they may be in this broad land—these all lost an advocate and a friend who longed for opportunities to battle for the removal of what he deeply believed to be unequal burdens. If he could have lived 10 years longer and continued his congressional career, he, by the expiration of that time, would have won the country's undisputed recognition of himself as one of the nation's great men—so his friends sincerely believe.

Elements of the stateman were in him that bid fair of development to a preeminent degree. He knew but little of the arts of the politician. He spurned the demagogue and the low level on which the demagogue crawls and flounders.

He was courageous in defense of any position he held. He knew not how to desert a principle that he believed in, or how to run away from his own convictions to follow, because popular, some other's lead. What was said by a distinguished Mississippian in public eulogy of Henry Clay soon after that great statesman's death, aptly describes the courage of our own deceased friend: "He never feared to take ground upon any question, and in doing so he never waited and watched for some gleams of light to break out from the mass of the people to show him the probable path of political safely. Fears, misgivings, uncertainty as to his personal interests never kept him silent and still. He received his inspirations from his own clear head and dauntless heart, and stood by them with unquenchable courage."

These qualities in Mr. Witherspoon were put to the test when the ship purchase bill was before Congress, also on the President's suggestion for greater preparedness for national defense, to each of which he was opposed. He had already become a target for criticism because of his stand on these two questions especially; but, had he lived, he was ready to defend his convictions with a courage that would have won at least the admiration of such as he might not have been able to convince.

"Honor to him who, self-complete and brave,
In scorn can serve his pathway to the grave,
And, heeding naught of what men think or say,
Make his own heart his world upon the way."

Dominating his qualities as scholar, lawyer, and statesman were his high moral character, his genuinely religious faith, and his exalted ideals. In all my intimate associations with him I never detected a disposition of his mind to descend toward a low and groveling thought. Some of the sublimest sentiments I ever heard him utter were uttered in the privacy of our own friendship in common conversation. I know he was sincere in all the public utterances he has been known to make in the interest of morality and righteousness.

His old-fashioned rugged honesty is illustrated by the habit he had of refusing to receive pay for the days he was absent from his seat in Congress—a habit referred to by the Washington Star in its recent notice of his death, and which that newspaper says would never have been known had not the Underwood resolution to "dock" absentees brought it out.

The social side of his nature was highly developed, especially in so far as the enjoyment of the society of congenial friends was concerned. Whenever he was his very best self, he was extremely genial and companionable. He enjoyed flashes of wit and clean, droll humor, and nobody could laugh more heartily than he could. In ordinary conversation he not infrequently was more instructive and entertaining than in the elucidation of the same matter in formal discourse. His favorite diversion was hunting and fishing, camp life, roughing it in the open. He loved dog and gun and rod and line, the woods and fields and streams, and, with it all, the jolly, care-free companionship of congenial friends.

Mr. WITHERSPOON never boasted of his ancestry—in fact, rarely referred to it, and then only when it found its way into a conversation naturally. It is nevertheless a fact that fine blood was in his veins. His mother was of a distinguished Mississippi family. She was a sister of Hon. Wm. F. Dowd, who in his lifetime was one of the State's greatest lawyers. He was not directly descended from the Revolutionary patriot, John Witherspoon, signer of the Declaration of Independence, but was of the same stock. He was, however, a descendant in direct line from John Knox, the great Scotch preacher and reformer of the sixteenth century. Although these are facts, yet he put no dependence upon them—though, quite likely, without showing it, he valued them. All this, however, notwithstanding his apparent disregard for it, may have had much to do in the molding of the spirit that dominated him.

A familiar incident related of Oliver Cromwell is, that when about to sit for his portrait he directed the painter preparing to enter upon the work: "Paint me as I am; leave not out one wrinkle, scar, or blemish." In my efforts to portray the character of our lamented friend, I have tried to be sufficiently true to let my brush at least suggest his chiefest scar. I have preferred not to follow with severest strictness the great Englishman's directions. Blemishes that might be worked into a sketch, yet which do not change materially the subject to be drawn, need not necessarily be painted into a picture. A rule in sketching from the object, is to draw nothing you do not see, even though you know that a part not seen exists. I do not wish to try to paint from memory motes I once thought I saw in my good friend's eye. I'd rather "seek his merits to disclose" than "draw his frailties from their dread abode." He was not without some faults, not without defects of disposition and manner at times which those who esteemed him most often wished had not been a part of his nature, but he had qualities of mind and heart that towered so high into the sunlight that these blemishes, like minor imperfections of symmetry to be noted sometimes in the rise of a sky-reaching mountain, were lost to view in contemplation of the magnitude and loftiness of his character.

Only a very short time before he entered upon the sleep of death—his condition supposed at the time to be greatly improved—a cooing babe, his infant grandson, of whom he was passionately fond, was taken into his room and held near him that he might feast his soul awhile in communion with this innocent loved one of his heart. The two there, each idol of the other, held love's sweet converse in language of their own—almost the last earthly communion of his soul with soul; for in an incredibly short time thereafter the Great Reaper came. Thus, this strong man, who never quailed from fronting in fierce combat giants full panoplied and worthy of his steel, found his last sensation of earthly joy in drinking love light from a baby's eyes.

Our friend has passed behind the veil that shuts the Great Beyond from mortal view. To him the mysteries have been revealed.

"Thou, friend of ours, whose spirit's gone,
Thou, whose life on earth is done,
Tell us, 'in what realms afar,
In what planet, in what star,
In what vast aerial space,
Shines the light upon thy face?
In what gardens of delight
Rests thy noble soul to-night?'"

Tell us the answer to the question which you, while here, pondered on and deemed the greatest to engage the thoughts of man.

If from beyond the dark waters a response could come to us from him, it, in substance, we believe, would be:

"I the upward way have trod;
Basking in the smile of God,
Read I on th' unfolded scroll:
'Life Immortal for the Soul.'"

Mr. Speaker, I fully concur in everything said by Mr. Dial in this beautiful and accurate address. He knew my good friend SAM WITHERSPOON as well as it was possible for one man to know another, and hence I thought it fitting and proper to incorporate his address, as well as the resolutions adopted by the Lauderdale County Bar Association, in my remarks in full as the testimony of those who knew him best, and hence could bear witness to his noble and manly traits from actual knowledge and intimate personal association. I loved SAM WITHERSPOON, and in his death I have lost a sincere, generous, noble, and kind friend; this House a painstaking, hard-working, brilliant, and most useful Member, and the country a patriotic citizen, highly cultured scholar, and a great statesman. No man rose more rapidly in this House from the time he entered it until his departure, and in his death the people, this House, and the country have sustained a very great loss. With tears in my eyes and genuine sadness in my heart I say to him good-by, but not forever, for by the grace of Him who loves us with an everlasting love and died that we might live, we shall meet again on the golden shore.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt in detail to analyze or refer at length to the character of Mr. WITHERSPOON. Those who have preceded me have spoken so eloquently, so correctly, and so truthfully of his many attributes, of his generous and noble character that I feel that it would be a useless repetition for me to attempt in a less able way to rehearse those attributes of his character.

When Mr. WITHERSPOON came to Congress he was assigned to service upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I was a member. It was the good fortune of the committee to have Mr. WITHERSPOON a member of that committee and as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs he was respected, beloved, honored, and highly esteemed by every member of that committee. It is useless for me to say that in the Committee on Naval Affairs, as well as every other committee, there exist differences of opinion. A committee would be useless if there were not. It would fail to serve its rightful purpose and to discharge adequately and efficiently the duties and the responsibilities of a committee of this House if there were not men upon the committee who, in the independence and vigor of their own thoughts and the execution of their purposes, did not assert their individual opinions and maintain their own ideas of right and of public policy. And Mr. WITHERSPOON maintained in a high-minded able way his ideas of appropriate policies of legislation.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that there existed between us a very warm personal friendship and an association that will be to me through the remainder of life an oasis of memory. It shall always be to me a pleasure to bear in mind the association that I had with him and the cooperation as well as the disagreements that we had in our work in the committee and in this House. While we often disagreed it was that difference that begot respect; it was that difference which men can entertain and still cherish a high reverence and regard for each other, and I call to mind at this time that in the last session of Congress, after we had finished the contest upon the floor of the House over the naval appropriation bill, and when his contention had failed to receive the indorsement of the House, that just here, at the front of the center aisle, we placed our arms around each other and walked out of the House to the cloakroom, each entertaining for the other a friendly feeling. I know I entertained for him a high and generous respect for the manliness of the man, the integrity of his purpose, and the vigor of his character and his intellect. He was a man of affable manners, a man whom we could love, and I believe that the affability of his manners begot for him in this House the warm and cordial friendship of all who knew him. He was a man of generous disposition. In all my associations with him I was always pleased and gratified at the generosity that he always manifested in his disposition toward everyone.

But, Mr. Speaker, the generosity of his disposition did not detract from the positiveness of his convictions. He was a man of very positive convictions. He believed something. Conviction to him was not milk and cider. Conviction with him was the truth. He believed in the reality, in the genuineness, and in the sincerity of what he believed, and I always respected and admired him for his positive convictions. Not only, Mr. Speaker, was he a man of positive convictions, but he was a man of courageous honesty with reference to his convictions. He studied questions. I do not think he jumped to his conclusions; I think he worked them out as best he could from the premises as they presented themselves to him honestly, sincerely, and courageously, and no man, whether he agreed with him or disagreed with him, failed to admire the courageous honesty of his positive convictions. He was warm in his attachments. Friendship with him was real, was sincere, was honest, was earnest. Friendship was not a superficial vaporous thing with him. Friendship with him was in his heart, was in his affections, was resting upon and prompted by generous, high-minded love of soul. He loved his friends and he wanted his friends to love him, and they did, and everyone who was thrown intimately with him I believe was impressed with the sincerity and genuineness of his friendship and the warmth and reality of his affections.

He was a man of keen intellect. I have often thought of his intellect as a keen, sharp sword, and, as I stated in the outset, while we often differed, I always had a great admiration for the keenness and the perception of his intellect. How quickly he would catch a question and how narrowly he could divide one contention from the other. He had a cultured intellect, a logical training. He was a man strong and powerful in debate.

His, Mr. Speaker, was a premature death. In the very prime of manhood, when it was not expected, death came to him. As we see it, as we believe it, it was a premature death, and that brings to us the thought of three great manifestations, birth, life, and death, all of them surrounded by a veil of mystery. We can not understand them. And as we think of death we so often think of it in its horrors. We are separated from our friends and our loved ones, we are deprived of their association and their company. It is a deprivation that comes with great horror to us, and we think almost exclusively of the horrors of death.

Mr. Speaker, should we not sometimes think of the opportunities and the privileges of death? I have my loved ones who have gone before, as all of us have. As we stand at their grave, whether it is a sunken hole or a grassy mound covered with flowers, still it is a grave. Or if we in our solitude, alone with ourselves, meditate over the loved ones who have gone before, there comes the recollection of one instance that I think has more of comfort, more of light, than any other recorded in history.

There comes to us the thought that early in the morning of the first day of the week, when the women hurried to the new-made tomb, and, as they looked in, found Him not. And then it was that the angel said, "He is not here. He is risen." Ah, Mr. Speaker, when we meditate around the graves of our loved ones, whether it be the sunken hole or the flower-covered mound, there is a comfort and a joy and a consolation to realize that they are not there; that they are risen—risen not in imagination, risen not in a dream, but risen into life, into that higher, grander, better life, where the opportunities shall be the opportunities of eternity, and where the privileges are the privileges of the infinite.

If in this life we have studied and been interested in the sceinces, what shall be the opportunities and the privileges over there? If here we have been interested in law and government, what shall be the privileges and opportunities of eternity and infinity in the development of the studies and the ambitions of life along those lines? Here we are hampered by the limitations of the flesh. I think we have good illustrations of it. I can see around me in a limited way, but if I take the telescope my vision is far extended. I can hear around me for a limited distance, but if I catch the telephone to my ear, how many thousand, thousand, thousand times it is multiplied.

The limitations of the flesh are many and they prescribe the spheres of our activities. When the habiliments of the flesh are rift away, and we are brought into communion and fellowship with eternity, with the privileges of the infinite, then we shall have opportunity to receive the dividends upon the investments that we have made in this life and have their continual enjoyment forever.

Mr. Speaker, when we mediate over the death of our friend, let not the horror of death alone possess us, but let us think of the opportunities and the privileges of that higher, nobler, better life in which to-day we can say of our friend, "He is not here. He is risen."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I believe that few men indeed with whom I have served in Congress during the past 14 years have so impressed their character upon the minds and consciences of their colleagues as did my distinguished friend. He was a scholar and a man of great industry, and therefore rose to eminence in the profession which he chose and became a leader of his people. Later in life than most men who enter this Hall, he was selected as a Representative of his people on this floor. There were two elements in his character which distinguished him above his fellows. First, he was honest. I mean he had intellectual integrity developed to a degree far beyond that possessed by the average man. He brought all the processes of that scholarly intellect to bear upon the solution of all questions that he was called upon as a public servant to solve. He never approached any question except with an open mind, with an honest and an earnest desire to arrive at the very truth. And in that endeavor I believe he was deflected from his course as little by the petty considerations that sometimes influence men as any man I have ever known.

He desired to know the right, that which was best for those whom he represented; and his constituency, as he understood it, were the people of these United States. To say to him when he was studying any question that "this is the course which the political organization to which he belonged preferred," or that "this was the view of the administration of the party to which he owed allegiance," or that "that was certainly the course which would meet with the popular approval"—I say to suggest such considerations to him was to idly waste the breath. He brushed those aside without one moment's consideration.

When he took the oath of office at this desk he did it seriously, for he was a serious man. He took this life and all of its duties and responsibilities seriously. And when he entered here upon the discharge of his public duties, he did it without mental reservation and with the full understanding that he was to sacrifice all that meant his personal advancement and preferment to the good of those he was called upon to serve.

And then there was another quality which he possessed—courage. Having arrived at the conclusion to which his mental processes had led him after study and research, he never faltered for one moment in the advocacy of that which he had determined to be right. I believe that no man with whom I have served could more truthfully have said, "Place honor in one eye and death in the other, and I will look on both indifferently. For let the gods so prosper me as I love the name of honor more than I fear death."

I have spoken of two elements in his character. There was another. It was gentleness; that gentleness which enkindleth nobleness. I believe in all my acquaintance I have never known a man fuller of the milk of human kindness than SAM WITHERSPOON. He and I were intimate and devoted friends, yet, perhaps, in our study of political and economic questions we arrived at the same conclusion about as rarely as any other two men in the House; but in spite of that, I never failed to get a cordial, kindly, and affectionate greeting from him.

Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me peculiarly appropriate that the memorial services should be held over SAM WITHERSPOON at this particular time, at this particular crisis in the affairs of our Government, when to-day, as much as ever before in the long history of the Republic, men should be courageous, men should look the situation squarely in the face and render the verdict of their conscience, serving their country and serving their country's good with utter disregard for the minor considerations of personal interest or of political advantage. And in this crisis, when so much is required of every representative of our people, if the contemplation of the character of our departed brother, who was to all of us the very embodiment of honor and courage, if the contemplation of that great character at this particular time can furnish us inspiration to be true to ourselves and, therefore, false to no man, we can say of him, although departed, as Brutus said on that fateful night before Phillipi, "Oh, Julius Caesar, thou art mighty still."

Mr. WITHERSPOON was in all particulars a manly man. He was as gentle as a woman, and as brave as Julius Cæsar. He was strenuous, he was aggressive in the advocacy of what he conceived to be right, and yet we all recognize that though he was persistent, though he was insistent, though he was in advocacy of what he believed to be right radical and aggressive, he was, nevertheless, gentle, "and the elements so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say to all the world, this was a man."

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, Judge WITHERSPOON and I entered the Sixty-second Congress together. If I mistake not, we met at the Democratic caucus held in January, 1911. It was my good fortune that we were given the same committee assignment—that of Naval Affairs. I say, it was my good fortune, as indeed it was, for so long as I am blessed with life and reason I shall cherish in the fondest way my association with Judge WITHERSPOON upon the committee here in the halls of Congress and where our duties called us while Congress was in session, which was almost continuously for four years; for, Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, Congress was in session the greater part of that time. I firmly believe that Judge WITHERSPOON was one of the rarest specimens of true American manhood, combining genius, statesmanship, and integrity and great industry, together with the enthusiasm of a patriot, who has ever occupied a seat in this historic hall. I never have seen a person fonder of children than he appeared to be. He seemed not to overlook an opportunity to give attention to them. I have often said that I would rather offend a grown person than a child, because the impressions made upon their little minds are more lasting than we sometimes think. Only a few evenings ago I was reading in the hearing of my 10-year old boy the address made in Judge WITHERSPOON'S memory by his lifelong friend and law partner—which, by the way, is a most complete story of the life of Judge WITHERSPOON, told in a very beautiful way. When I had concluded it I looked up and found my boy in tears. I asked him, "Robert, did you like Judge WITHERSPOON?" And he replied, "Yes, daddy; I loved him."

Great men often are so different from others that they are frequently misunderstood. He appeared not to be understood by some and because of this misunderstanding, real or feigned, he was sometimes assailed and criticized. I desire here and now to give expression to this fact, so it may go into the RECORD in cold type, that, in my opinion, there is no person who entertained a higher regard for, or warmer appreciation of, the professional men in the department with which his committee had to do than did Judge WITHERSPOON. He was a real friend of the service, and the men in the service of that Department of Government. Yet, Mr. Speaker, he believed that it was a department of Government and that it existed for the good and the glory of the Government. His courage stood out in bold relief here in these Halls where we see so much sidestepping. I shall never forget how appalled I was on that morning when meeting two reporters down on Pennsylvania Avenue they announced to me the death of Judge WITHERSPOON. It seemed to me that of all times we needed his service most now. We need his courage as an example to us. We need him now, with his words of wisdom, upon these questions that are fraught with such consequences to the country, because, Mr. Speaker, as his colleague from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has so eloquently said, he was prompted by the highest motives in all his utterances and was not fearful that something that he might say here would get back home and affect him personally to his disadvantage. He did not quake or tremble when questions, however trying, came up for decision, nor did he weigh them with the mathematical precision with which a chemist weighs his compounds, observing with the closest scrutiny possible the effect his decision or vote would have upon his personal fortunes, but with a burning ambition to serve the great body of people who entrusted him with authority, devoid of selfishness and sophistry, he took his stand as a manly man.

Let it be said to his credit that no person ever heard him refer to his home people in other than the most affectionate terms. His love for his people and his State approached a passion. If this trait was equaled by any other, it was his zeal and candor, backed up by his persistent determination to promote the welfare of his State and Nation by protecting, as he believed, every inherent right that belonged to the individual in the face of great opposition and sometimes vile abuse directed at him by those whose schemes he interfered with. It is so easy for one to go with the current, but it takes superior courage and manhood for a man to stand by the right, as God has given him to see the right, in spite of great influences which sometimes resort to abuse and slander.

There are many incidents I could relate that would give those here who did not know him as well as I did, and those who may peruse the RECORD and these facts, a better insight into his nature and to the man himself. On the many trips taken by the Committee on Naval Affairs, whether we were visiting navy yards or other points of interest to the Government, he was at all times giving his closest attention to the things about him.

I shall not take up more of the time of the House, excepting to say that on one occasion while in Philadelphia, when several committees of the House and other citizens were visiting that city, there was a scene that I shall always recall in the old Continental Hall, the chief attraction, of course, in that great city of Philadelphia. It was along in the afternoon of the day when it so happened that a number of us were present in that almost sacred precinct. Among those present were Members of the House, as well as others, and if my memory serves me correctly it was Congressman Donohoe who called out to the crowd, "Gentlemen, here in this presence and on this occasion we have a number of Members of Congress from several States of the Union, and it would be fitting, it seems to me, if some of those present would say something to this body of people gathered here." I do not recall the number of Members who talked on that occasion, or who they were, excepting Judge HARDY, of Texas, and some two or three others, including Judge WITHERSPOON. A more impressive occasion, it seems to me, would be hard to imagine. Standing there among the old furniture and chairs occupied by the fathers of our country and near the table upon which the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were signed, and with the portraits of those great men apparently looking down upon us, and among those portraits was that of his kinsman, John Witherspoon, was an experience that I shall never forget. I think it was the most impressive occasion of my life.

Mr. Speaker, I am reminded that we too frequently put off making references to those qualities we admire in our friends until occasions of this kind. It seems to me that it would be better if we could occasionally say a word of cheer to our friends while we are with them than to wait until they are gone and then say it in the presence of others; and on this occasion it affords me pleasure that I recall that during one of the fights which were being waged on the naval appropriation bill I took occasion to use the following language upon the floor of the House during the lifetime of Judge WITHERSPOON:

> Mr. Chairman, I hope to get great pleasure later in life out of things incident to my service in Congress. Chief among them are friendships formed while here, and among all the friendships formed here I count as one of the rarest and sweetest the friendship for and my association with one whom I regard among the ablest and most patriotic, as well as the purest in mind and soul—Judge WITHERSPOON, of Mississippi.

I am not rebellious against that power that "doeth all things well" because of the taking off of those whom I love, though I sometimes am compelled to confess that I can not understand these purposes, and it is well, perhaps, that I do not understand them. I felt, and there are many others, no doubt, who felt as

I did, that we needed Judge WITHERSPOON. As said of Saul, "He stood a head above his brothers." He was a towering oak in the forest. In my opinion, not only his district and his State but the Nation in his death sustained an irreparable loss.

Life: We've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cause a sigh, a tear.
Then steal away, give little warning;
Choose thine own time;
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me good morning.

[Mr. CALLAWAY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I would be untrue to the memory of that splendid soul which in the zenith of its power and in the very flower of its usefulness to humanity was called to join the choir invisible if in some small way, at least, I did not remind those who are gathered here to-day of the sentiment which swayed the life of the friend who has gone before, and therefore I shall speak a word or two regarding the tie which bound me to the lamented dead. It was a tie of brotherhood, of common sympathy, of like purpose. When I became a Member of this great body in the Sixty-third Congress it was but natural that I should cast about me for men who felt as I feel touching some of the great questions with which we were called upon to deal; and it was not long before I discovered in the late Judge WITHERSPOON a soul responsive to my own in one of the most vital matters which have ever confronted the American people.

Judge WITHERSPOON drew me to him by his hatred of war, by his hatred of the war spirit, by his merciless antagonism to that sham patriotism which finds expression in the doctrines of force, by his masterful opposition to the propaganda of jingoism masquerading under the guise of preparedness. Perhaps there has never been a Member of Congress more thoroughly equipped than Judge WITHERSPOON for combating the monstrous false pretense against which he waged ceaseless battle. And just a few days before his death he wrote me from his home in Meridian to say that he was ready to renew the fray the moment the new Congress should enter upon its work. He had mastered the technique of ships and guns. He knew more than the experts concerning these matters. He was able to confound all their arguments. Every plea they set up was a challenge to him which he was able to meet with an unerring answer. His value to this House and to the country it would be impossible to overestimate. The loss to us and to the United States, which his death has caused, I shall not attempt to set forth. Yet I feel certain that were he alive to-day his influence in checking the tremendous movement toward militarism would be felt from shore to shore.

The man in whose memory we are gathered to-day had a dream—a dream of peace. And—

He whom a dream hath possessed knoweth no more of doubting.
For mist and the blowing of winds and the mouthing of words he scorns;
Not the sinuous speech of schools he hears, but a knightly shouting;
And never comes darkness down, yet he greeteth a million morns.
He whom a dream hath possessed treads the impalpable marches.
From the dust of the day's long road he leaps to a laughing star,
And the ruin of worlds that fall he views from eternal arches,
And rides God's battlefield in a flashing and golden car.

Yes; SAMUEL WITHERSPOON was possessed by a dream. And it was a splendid dream—a dream of a world at peace; of a world forgetting its old rancors, its old jealousies, its old prejudices, its old blood lust; a world given to high ideals, to quiet labors, to constructive activities, to education, to the inculcation of love, to the upbuilding of all that is sweet and noble and fine in human life.

He has gone before his dream has come true. But it will come true in God's good time; and all the sooner for this man having lived and having possessed it and been possessed by it. In all tenderness of affectionate regard for the memory of one who wrought nobly while it was permitted him to work, I lay my humble tribute on his grave and join with all who knew and loved him in garlanding his tomb.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this occasion, but I shall not forego the opportunity to indorse the splendid tributes paid to Judge WITHERSPOON as just in every respect, handsome as they are. I early came in contact with Judge WITHERSPOON as a new Member of this great body and that feeling of sentiment which goes out to first-term men, one to the other, enhanced our relations. The announcement of his death was a great shock to me and I felt that a splendid, good, useful, honest, patriotic man had been taken from our midst. He was strong, able, kind, gentle, loving, and lovable. He gave from the bottom of his heart the best that was in him for humanity and he got the best from humanity. A combative force, powerful, strong, he realized the great truth in this life that the empire we possess is within us and the responsibility is upon us to develop the powers which God has given us for the good of mankind. He was an honest man and I know that he was a kindly man. We served on the Committee on Naval Affairs. We disagreed, I very materially from him, but he was tolerant and kind, as all strong, capable men are.

We disagree frequently on this floor, but through those differences, clearer distinctions arise and better results follow to the people.

Personal misconceptions arise in this large body through lack of opportunity to really know each other. In this connection it is pertinent to recall a colloquy said to have taken place between Samuel Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith. They were walking along the street one day, and Johnson, looking across the highway, said, "I hate that man over there." The genial, warm-hearted Goldsmith, turning to Johnson with much surprise, said, "Johnson, you do not known that man. Why should you hate him?" Johnson replied, "That is the reason. If I did know him I would love him."

Many of us had the great privilege of knowing Judge WITHERSPOON and I do not think any man in this House had ill feeling toward him. Indeed in my time here no Member had more warm, earnest, understanding friends than he.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, while in attendance at church this Sabbath morning a colleague informed me that memorial exercises were being held in the House of Representatives in memory of our late departed friend, Judge WITHERSPOON. As soon as I could conveniently do so, I left that place of worship and came to this Hall, which to us all on this occasion carries with it all the sacred feeling that a place of worship could signify. I wanted to attend these exercises simply in order that by my presence here I might pay my tribute of love and respect to my friend's memory, whose friendship I enjoyed and whose character I admired. Since coming into the Hall I have been requested to speak a word on this occasion. It is a pleasure and labor of love to comply with this request, although I regret greatly that I did not know of these exercises before coming, so that I might have had time to prepare some remarks that, in a feeble way at least, would be partly indicative of my high regard and warm personal esteem for Judge WITHERSPOON.

In life Judge WITHERSPOON was a likable, lovable character. To those who did not enjoy the pleasure of his acquaintance he may have seemed stern and severe, but to those whom he gave his confidence and friendship, while he was always all that a true man should be, yet he was as gentle as a child. I had the pleasure of living with him for almost two years. We both resided at the same hotel in the city, and I came to know him well and to admire and love him greatly. It was always a pleasure to me after a hard day's work to have the opportunity to draw my chair up by his side and to enjoy the rare pleasure of his society, wisdom, and scholarship. Judge WITHERSPOON was an exact man and a finished scholar. We used to love to exchange quotations on Shakespeare, the poets, and the old masters. I soon observed that when he quoted from Shakespeare or the classics that he would not quote something about like the masters wrote it, but he quoted it in the exact words they used, and this was characteristic of his information on all lines. It was exact, precise, and thorough.

Judge WITHERSPOON was a man of striking personality, a personality that left its impress upon all whom he met. From my boyhood days I have carried in my mind certain pictures such as we all love to carry, certain pictures of unique characters of whom we have read but never seen. I had read much in books about one delightful character commonly termed the typical old southern gentleman, but I never met in the flesh a man who just filled that picture in my mind until I met Judge WITHERSPOON.

No one could know Judge WITHERSPOON without feeling that here was a man who filled to overflow the great measures of life, honor, faithfulness, and loyalty to a principle. I once said to him when he was relating some of his law experiences, "Judge, were I friendless, a stranger, innocent, and in trouble I should ask no greater favor than to have you either for the prosecutor or for the attorney in charge of my defense." As prosecutor I believe that justice would be mingled with mercy and that nothing could induce him to go beyond that limit. His nature was tempered with sincere love for his fellow men and he could look at their frailties with an eye of pity.

Everyone who knew Judge WITHERSPOON had the most profound regard for him in every way, because he possessed all the great elements that go to make up true character, and at last, gentlemen, character is the one real essential of life. All other attainments fade and perish, but character shines on. When the greatest positions and attainments are forgotten character still survives. It is the one thing that is immortal, that lives on bathed in immortality.

When I first heard of his sudden death I could not have been more surprised and shocked to hear of the death of anyone outside of a near relative than I was when I heard of the death of Judge WITHERSPOON. I said of him and about him to a friend, here was a man like a tall oak in the forests that has fallen that towered above the ordinary man among his fellows, and I said of him and about him, he has so left the noble traits of his character impressed upon his fellow men that his influence will be like that of the shepherd of King Admetus:

And after he was dead and gone,
And e'en his memory dim,
Earth seems more sweet to live upon,
More full of love, because of him.

So shall we think of him in loving remembrance as having left to us a rich heritage of faith and courage for all the years to come,

Death takes us by surprise
And stays our hurrying feet;
The great design unfinished lies,
Our lives are incomplete.

But in the dark unknown
Perfect their circles seem,
Even as a bridge's arch of stone
Is rounded in the stream.

So when a great man dies,
For years beyond or ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

Garlands upon his grave,
And flowers upon his hearse.
And to the tender heart and brave
The tribute of this verse.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, I realize that the colleagues of the late Judge WITHERSPOON, of Mississippi, wish to take more of the allotted time to-day, and so I shall ask that I may have the privilege of inserting in the RECORD at an early day a tribute of my love and affection for him.

During this last year many of my friends have gone away to the land beyond, but for no one of the public men or men in public service that I have known have I felt the loss more than for my genial friend, Judge WITHERSPOON.

So, without taking more time now from his dear colleagues from his State who have served with him and have known him for a lifetime, I shall ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I gladly accept this opportunity to pay my last tribute of respect to the memory of my friend.

I knew Judge WITHERSPOON better than most men. Early during his career as a Member of this House I learned to respect his sterling honesty and his conscientious adherence to duty as he saw it. In all his acts, whether as a Member of this body or as a practicing lawyer, as a citizen, as the father of a family, he consulted first of all his conscience. He was in all the emergencies of this life an honest man. And I have often thought that if after I passed through the doors of this life into the great beyond men could say this of me, they would be paying me the highest possible compliment. He was splendidly endowed by education, by inherited tendencies, and culture for the duties of the life which it seems to our human minds has been closed all too soon. In all the circumstances of this life he discharged his full duty to his district, to his State, to his community, to his family, to himself. To-day over his grave in the far-off Southland warm breezes of spring are blowing. May the winds of winter blow soft and low where he lies, may the earth rest lightly always upon the heart of SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON, of Mississippi.

His was a busy, active life. In this world of men he was a man, brave, honest, true, in all the activities of life consulting first of all his conscience.

The stars do not go down—they only rise on another shore; they shine somewhere always, bright jewels in the great dome of heaven.

The flowers fade and pass away, the leaves fall, but they are not dead; they only wait through cold wintry months the coming again of the sun and the sweet, warm breezes of spring.

There came a time in his busy career, the time which sooner or later comes to all of us, when the tide is low—the time when the night comes down and covers with its dark curtains the day, while from far out on the cold waters of the unknown sea is heard the call of voices. In the silent hush of the pale twilight he sailed away through the purple shadows out on the ebbing tide of the unknown sea on toward the far-off mystic isles where in a safe anchorage lie the craft of those who have gone before.

Our friend is not dead; he has but passed through the clouds and the mists which envelop the day; he has entered into the newer and larger life on the unseen shores beyond the unknown sea.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled here to-day to pay a tribute of love and respect to the memory of our departed colleague, the late lamented SAMUEL ANDREW WITHERSPOON.

It was my good fortune to become intimately acquainted with Mr. WITHERSPOON, we both having lived at the same hotel for several years. My acquaintance with our late colleague began when he first came to Congress and it soon ripened into a sincere friendship which lasted until his death. Judge WITHERSPOON was a unique figure, an able lawyer, possessing a keen, discriminating, analytic mind, he yet was in some respects a dreamer and a poet. He was one of the closest reasoners I have ever known. Once the premises were admitted he would irresistibly reach a conclusion. In arguing with him, to admit a single one of his premises was to court defeat. The safest plan was always to enter a general denial. His moral courage was superb. I have never known anyone in public life possessed of more courage than he, and as fearless in expressing his opinion on the floor of the House. Whether a measure was popular or not was a question that never entered Mr. WITHERSPOON'S mind. He never paused for a moment to reflect what consequences his vote might have upon his own political fortunes. Having decided views on every public question, there was no middle course that he ever traveled. What he believed to be right was the only standard by which he measured his expressions in the House and to the country.

When there was a great clamor for Federal appropriations for good roads, and a bill to appropriate aid to nearly every rural route in the United States came up for final passage in the House of Representatives, Mr. WITHERSPOON, standing upon his ideas of local self-government, cast prudence to the winds and voted against the appropriation.

Perhaps the strongest advocate of prohibition in a delegation, where all are in favor of State and National prohibition, he again stood upon his ideals of local self-government and opposed the Hobson amendment, though none knew better than he how his position, both at home and abroad, would be misconstrued.

Powerful in debate, subtle in argument, rich in information, and analytical in his conclusions, he always had an audience when he addressed the House, commanding alike the respect and interest of all who heard him. I have frequently made the statement, and I still believe it to be true, that Judge WITHERSPOON knew more about the details connected with the American Navy than any man in public life. Though a Member of the House for less than five years and coming here with perhaps the only information on naval subjects that a busy man, engaged in a lucrative practice of law, who spent his leisure hours in study, could have obtained, his information was marvelous. Whether it was about the number of guns on a battleship, the thickness of the armor plate of a dreadnaught, the speed of a cruiser, the number of officers or men, the size of the various guns, the distance they could effectively shoot, the intricacies of target practice, the comparative strength of the different navies of the world, the formation of a fleet in battle, the cost of the ships and their equipment, the time when they were built, their tonnage and displacement, the amount of work in different navy yards, or any other detail connected with naval affairs, he was thoroughly familiar and could answer any question asked him.

It seems almost incredible that in the short space of five years Mr. WITHERSPOON should have become an acknowledged authority on such matters.

Mr. WITHERSPOON was an orator of no mean attainments. There has seldom been in the House of Representatives a greater demonstration of approval than that which followed his speech for the preservation of the captured flags. Not only was there a stupendous burst of applause at the conclusion of his tribute, but Members on both sides of the House rushed over to him and extended their congratulations. I am going to read you a few sentences from that speech:

When these flags were exhibited to the committee and I saw their torn and tattered fragments struggling, as it were, to hold together and apparently breaking asunder, like the sunlit shreds of a cloud whose glory is about to depart forever, I was unwilling to say by my vote that those fading emblems of the national glory, those neglected tokens of a splendid heroism, those sacred rags of an unconquerable

Navy, were not worth the cost of their preservation. If it be difficult to justify this expenditure, it is impossible to excuse an assent to the impending destruction of these flags. Written all through their precious folds there are lessons which we can not afford to forget, there are memories which we can not afford to dim, and there are hopes which we can not darken without shutting out the very sunlight of our future. These flags tell us of a day when the public good was held high above private gain, of a day when American heroes hastened to surrender and to sacrifice position, place, property, reputation, and life itself for the public good, and when they were never seen rushing with open hands into the open Treasury when the value of noble deeds and public victories were not measured in dollars and cents.

They tell us of a day when the essence and the glory of the Union were that all the States were equal and when geography, but not sentiment, divided our country into sections.

Equally beautiful was the tribute he paid the American flag before the Society of the Sons of the American Revolution. He said:

And no further discussion or argument is needed to-night, for all that I have said or could say is more beautifully and eloquently written and expressed in the precious folds of the glorious flag presented here in your presence. The white stripes, said to be bleached with the Nation's tears, teaches mankind that peace on earth and good will to all men is the policy of our Government, while the red bars are the sacred emblem of the heroic blood which the fathers of the Revolution shed from Canada to Georgia as the purchase price of our liberties and happiness.

The stars of the flag mark the number of sovereign States, and in the sublime language of heaven itself gives us the assurance that no more will the people of any community in our country ever be deprived of the blessings of local self-government, while their glorious cluster in the corner of our emblem of liberty teaches the lesson that the American States are bound together in a Union established for the preservation of liberty. And if you want to know how long those stars will continue to shine with the stars of heaven and how long that union will fill the object of its formation, the flag answers back that those stars are clustered together in the background of blue which never changes. The tints on the cheeks of the flowers disappear in the withering of the petals; the crimson glow of the sunlight in the frowning cloud is fleeting and short; the beautiful green with which nature robes her leaves and grasses must soon change to the colors of decay and death; but when God created the heavens he painted the sky with his own fadeless blue, and the paintbrush, dropping into the deep, wide sea, gave it the same immortal hue, and the blessed song of the flag is that so long as the skies above us and the seas around us refuse to change their fadeless color so long will the Stars and Stripes wave in triumph over the land of the brave and the home of the free.

These lofty thoughts and patriotic utterances conclusively demonstrated Mr. WITHERSPOON's capacity as an orator. The world is better off that Mr. WITHERSPOON lived. He has passed away and his voice will be heard no more upon the floor of this House. His gentle smile and friendly handshake are gone, never to return, but his winning personality, his rugged honesty, and his sterling worth will long be remembered by all who knew him. He lived a good life and trod with unfaltering steps the paths that lead to rectitude and honor. His faith was sublime; it was founded upon the rock of ages, and when the dread messenger appeared to Mr. WITHERSPOON he "went not like the quarry slave scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed by his unfaltering trust, approached his grave like one who wraps the drapery of his couch around him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

It was my melancholy privilege to be present at his funeral. The business houses of the city of Meridian closed their doors in respect to his memory, and the sorrowful crowd which gathered in the Presbyterian Church, the funeral cortege which accompanied his remains to the cemetery, the wilderness of flowers laid upon his bier, and the look of sorrow and distress upon the faces of all who gathered in that silent city of the dead to pay last tribute of respect and love to the memory of this good man attested the real esteem and worth in which our colleague was held by his fellow townsmen.

Judge WITHERSPOON was my friend. I was a frequent visitor to his office, and we have had many discussions over public questions. While we widely differed in our views upon many of these questions, yet on the great subject of Federal taxation he and I were kindred spirits. We thought alike about this question, and I feel indebted to him for the many valued suggestions that I received from him, who had a thorough understanding of the subject.

Grateful people have throughout the ages erected lofty and imposing monuments commemorating the life, the character, and virtues of their illustrious dead. These monuments are inspirations to generations yet to come, lifting them to a higher plane and leading them to a better life, but greater than memorials of marble and bronze, more than fame and wealth, is the example of one who bequeathed to his family and his friends the priceless legacy of an honored name and the memory of a life filled with earnest deeds.

[Mr. KITCHIN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. WITHERSPOON was limited to his term of service in the House. Each of us came to this city as a new Member of Congress at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress. Coming from the same State, it was but natural that we should soon meet. We became friends and spent much time together. I learned to admire, respect, and love him.

I shall speak briefly of those things in his life and character that inspired the sentiments to which reference has just been made.

SAMUEL ANDREW WITHERSPOON was truly a great man, a rare man—rare in intellect, in courage, in nobleness and strength of character.

His was a giant intellect. A student all his life, his mind was trained and stored with information on many subjects. Indeed, the fullness and maturity of his intellectual powers were the admiration of all who knew him.

Having the faculty of graphic clearness and strength of statement, having a power of analysis and logical force rarely found, and being able to center all his forces upon the question at issue, he was a power in any cause that he championed. These things, together with a sincere earnestness, made him an interesting and entertaining speaker, whether one agreed with him or not. His powers of logical analysis were so great that if his premises were admitted his conclusions were well-nigh irresistible.

Although he was not much given to speaking here—I think he made only about a half dozen speeches on this floor—he was recognized as one of the strongest men in this body. He was always listened to with great interest, for everyone knew that he never spoke unless he had something to say that was worth the saying.

I shall not dwell longer upon this phase, because indisputable proof of his intellectuality are written on the pages of the law books of his State, where he practiced law for many years; and in the records of Congress, in speeches, in reports prepared in the course of his committee work, and in the examination of witnesses before the Naval Affairs Committee where he displayed a most wonderful grasp of the details of all matters relating to the Navy. Then, there are other elements in his character that are higher, nobler and more important than mere intellect.

A great intellect is a priceless possession, the ability to clothe thoughts in burning words, winged as it were with lightning, is worthy of admiration; but these things are of little real worth unless the man possessing them have a soul which loves truth and accepts it.

I never knew a man who adhered more closely to a high standard. He loved Goodness because it was good and Truth because it was lovely. To every question he applied the straight-edge of Truth, of Righteousness, of Justice.

His conduct was always actuated by the loftiest motives. The love of duty was stamped upon his soul as an eternal truth. He may have believed in the old maxim that "Honesty is the best policy"; but this was not what caused him to be honest. He was so from principle and habit.

With a soul enkindled with enthusiasm for what is good and noble, a mind aglow with truth, a heart filled with love for mankind, an eye that shone bright with honor, a look that bespoke freedom, manliness and veracity, and a bearing that declared him brave, frank, generous and true, anyone who saw him could tell that he was a man. Everyone was impressed that, though he might make mistakes through error of judgment, it was absolutely impossible for him to be mean or little.

Although he differed, violently at times, from many of his associates, yet his sincerity was never questioned, but all admired his candor and courage of conviction.

If he had lived in the days of the Knights of the Round Table, he could have subscribed to the oath that Tennyson represents them as taking.

To reverence their conscience as their king,
To break the heathen and uphold the Christ,
To ride abroad redressing human wrongs,
To speak no slander, no, nor listen to it.
To honor his own words as if his God's,
To lead sweet lives in purest chastity,
To love one maiden only, cleave to her,
To worship her by years of noble deeds,
Not only to keep down the base in man,
But teach high thought and amiable words
And courtliness and the desire of fame
And love of truth and all that makes a man.

He had caught the vision of true greatness—that it lies in nobility of mind and goodness of heart, as well as in illustrious deeds. Greatness without goodness is a myth. Position, place, power, all dwindle into insignificance when compared with the emotions of a heart filled with love of justice, mercy, and truth. Back of everything great must be a heart, a conscience, a conviction.

If a Christian is one who is restoring God's likeness to his character, our friend was one. No dishonorable act detracts from his fame; his hands were clean and his integrity incorruptible.

It was the dying boast of Pericles that he never made an Athenian weep. It should be a matter of pride to his family that no friend of Mr. WITHERSPOON ever blushed or hung his head in shame because of an ignoble word or deed of his; that no one can be found to reproach him for ingratitude or who can say that he ever failed to discharge in full measure any obligation.

He locked his lips too close to speak a lie;
He washed his hands too white to touch a bribe.

One thing that impressed me as much as anything in his character was his love for humanity. His great heart went out to the poor, crushed to earth by privation and sorrow. The tides of love for his fellow man ran with mighty pulsations through his soul.

The greatest ambition of his life—and no man can have a nobler ambition—was to be of real service to mankind, and he was never passive or indifferent when some legislative wrong was about to be committed, as he believed, against the interests of the people.

His was a genuine affection for the common people; and he was always ready to aid them in the passage of legislation which their conditions demanded. Although thus active in their interest, no one ever heard him utter a word of flattery or ever knew him to do any act that in the remotest degree approached the appeal or the conduct of a demagogue.

Frequently we hear men declaim in eloquent words about the rights of the people and their great love and affection for them, and we doubt their sincerity. But when Mr. WITHERSPOON spoke in the interest of the masses, no one doubted him. I have talked with him frequently in the privacy of his office about matters of legislation and its effect upon the people of the nation; and when he would remark upon the condition of those who did not have even the necessities of life, I have seen his eyes fill with tears and his voice choke with emotion. Many men may have accomplished more to relieve the poor, the distressed, the down-trodden, the heavy-burdened of earth, but no man ever possessed greater sympathy for such.

Although it does not relate exactly to the subject that I have just been discussing, I shall refer to an incident that came under my observation. Mr. WITHERSPOON had defeated Hon. Adam Byrd, who had been a Member of Congress for several years. They had engaged in a heated campaign, into which the bitterness of factional and partisan politics had entered. Two years later Mr. Byrd announced as a candidate against him.

One day, a few months prior to the election, Mr. WITHERSPOON came into my office with a telegram in his hand. I noticed that he was very much distressed. Coming up to me, he said "I have just received bad news." I asked him to tell me about it. Hesitating a moment because of emotion, he then said, while tears were flowing from his eyes, "Poor Adam Byrd is dead."

Reference has been made to this as illustrative of the great, tender heart that throbbed in his bosom. Ready a few minutes before to go out and do battle with his political enemy with all the vigor that he possessed, now that he was still in death the strong man was overcome and any feeling that he might have had against Mr. Byrd was instantly forgotten, and such a feeling of sympathy and sorrow swept over him that it caused him to weep. To me it was the strongest evidence of a kind, sympathetic, and great heart.

Mr. Speaker, the philosophy of life entertained by him has been splendidly expressed by one who said: "The end of all worthy struggle is to establish morality as the basis of individual and national life, to make righteousness prevail, to make justice reign, to spread beauty, gentleness, wisdom, and peace, to widen opportunity, to increase good will, to move in the light of higher thoughts and larger hopes, to encourage science and art, to foster industry and thrift, education and culture, reverence and obedience, purity and love, honesty, sobriety, and disinterested devotion to the common good—this is the patriot's aim, this his ideal."

He was intensely patriotic. A Democrat believing in the great fundamental principles of Thomas Jefferson, he struggled all his life for their exemplification, believing that only in the working out of those great principles could our nation measure up to its highest destiny and the people receive the highest good.

If he failed to keep step with many of the so-called progressive movements of the day, if he refused to align himself with the political fads and "isms" that seem to be the order of the day, it was not from any lack of patriotism. It was because he believed in the Constitution and was convinced that if the principles of Democracy as set out by Jefferson, which he had taken as the rule and guide of his political faith, were put into practical operation and effect, within the limits of the Constitution, that was all that the functions of government could do to make a people happy, contented, and prosperous.

He was jealous of any encroachment of rights under the Constitution, and especially in regard to the powers of the States. The doctrine of "State rights" was sacred. He believed that under the Constitution this is a union of sovereign, indestructible States, with the right in each to control all domestic questions and conditions, such as labor, education, domestic relations, preservation of order, good morals, encouragement of industry, and the protection of people in the pursuit of happiness and the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property; and that the only duty of the Federal Government was, under a strict construction of its delegated functions, to perpetuate an indissoluble union for the general good.

A tribute to the memory of Mr. WITHERSPOON would be wholly incomplete unless reference was made to one of his most striking characteristics, his courage. I do not refer to physical courage, although he had an abundance of it. However much we may admire physical courage, it is not comparable to moral courage. Men may fight for various reasons, out of pride, out of necessity, out of meanness of spirit. Moral courage is that boldness to do right, to do that which ought to be done, without any regard to the effect upon one's self.

He possessed courage of conviction in the highest degree. I never knew a man who was so willing to sacrifice himself for his convictions. It has been said that "God hates a coward." If this be true, then He must have loved S. A. WITHERSPOON with an overwhelming love, for a more courageous man never lived. His courage was of the kind that caused the martyrs of old to suffer death for their convictions.

Love of power and position is a controlling force with many. It was not so with him. He would have surrendered his office in a moment rather than vote for any measure that he did not believe to be right. He loved his party, but he did not worship it to the extent that he was willing to follow it whether it was right or wrong.

He was not a good party man in the sense that he was willing to follow the dictates of so-called party leaders. He reserved the right to think for himself. Loving his party as he did, he believed that it was an agency through which just laws could be enacted and governmental affairs administered for the common good; but when, in his judgment, it failed to serve this purpose he never failed to decline to follow its behests.

After earnest, thoughtful consideration of a question he would make up his mind, and he always exercised his judgment, never yielding to the command of a caucus, or any other authority. By many this was considered a fault; but calm, cool reflection will lead us to the conclusion that independence of thought and courage of conviction are virtues to be admired, if not always commended.

Andrew Jackson once said:

I would not dance before the Throne of Power for the Throne itself.

This was the spirit of our lamented friend. The waters of political oblivion might have been surging around him and threatening to overwhelm and engulf him as the waters of the Red Sea the Egyptians, and he would have voted his convictions without any regard to those conditions. An effort by any man to change the revolutions of the sun would be no more futile than an effort to cause him to act contrary to his convictions. Mr. Speaker, I loved him for his magnificent courage.

In all my acquaintance with him I never detected but one defect in his character. He was impatient of contradiction and sometimes spoke too harshly. This was not due to egotism, stubbornness, or a desire to offend; but was due simply to a quick temper, a strong will, and the fact that his own opinions were so thoroughly fixed and, to him, were so clear and apparent that he had no doubt as to their correctness; and he simply failed to make proper allowance for the opinions of others. Everyone knew his gentlemanly and generous impulses. Therefore no one took offense at his outbursts of temper, as they knew that no offense was intended. His fault was single, his virtues many, so the fault was easily excused.

Mr. Speaker, it will always be a matter of pleasure to me that I had the opportunity to become so intimately acquainted with such a man. One whose passion was the love of his fellow men, whose eloquence was the inspiration of justice, whose hope was human freedom, and whose logic fixed its steady gaze upon the star of truth; one who did right with compelling insistence and who was not afraid that he might do wrong—a malady none too seldom found among those who are not sure of their approaches, who distrust themselves and stand with reluctant feet, holding action in subjection, on the very threshold of duty; one who, amid all the trials and tribulations, the vexations and vanities of a long life,

Had kept
The whiteness of his soul.

[Mr. HARRISON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. SISSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, our deceased colleague, Mr. WITHERSPOON, was almost a father to me. When I came to Washington, about the 20th of February, 1913, he and my friend SISSON, the gentleman who last addressed you, took me under their wings. All my other colleagues from Mississippi were kind to me, but these two Members made me feel at home. I had no office until late in March and Mr. WITHERSPOON and Mr. SISSON gave me the privileges of their offices and the use of their secretaries. I had an office assigned me next to Mr. WITHERSPOON'S. We boarded at the same hotel until October of that year. After I brought my wife to the city of Washington he was a constant visitor at my home; a welcome always awaited him there. He dined with us many Sundays and evenings in the week. I learned to love the man. I realized that he was a real friend and a champion of the plain people of this Republic.

The last time I ever saw him was at the State fair at Jackson, Miss., on the 26th day of last October. We went through the fair and looked at all the farm exhibits. He had dinner with me on the grounds that day. He discussed the fact that while the farmers were producing all of those splendid products from mother earth they were being robbed by the special interests and through different forms of taxation. The man out on the hillside with a small farm and a little box house was always first in the thoughts of Mr. WITHERSPOON. The poor, the wealth-producing masses of this Republic, had a stanch champion in the distinguished gentleman from the fifth district of Mississippi, and when I was called as one of his colleagues to be at that sad funeral late in November of last year I could not help weeping like a woman when I saw his bier in front of me. And I feel that same heavy heart here to-day, because I know that in the loss of SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON the plain people of this Republic, of his district, and of his State have lost a good man, a great champion, a strong gladiator who always fought in their behalf. Christianity has lost a potential exponent, the world has lost a great statesman, a profound thinker, a philospher, and a true patriot.

SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON is not dead; he has simply gone to meet his God. His influence will live for centuries in this Republic; yes, so long as the United States Government shall stand. Who is he who will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD who can fail to be impressed with the great patriotic utterances of SAM WITHERSPOON? To-day his work in the Committee on Naval Affairs is ringing around the entire world. Every newspaper that discusses the subject at all refers to SAMUEL A. WITHERSPOON. He proved as a member of that committee as conclusively as any mathematician ever proved a problem in mathematics that we have the second navy in the world. No man who studies the subject and who will accept SAMUEL WITHERSPOON'S questions to the experts before that committee at the last session of Congress can fail to reach the same conclusion that SAMUEL WITHERSPOON reached, and his great speech on the floor of this House, demonstrating his understanding on that proposition, will live as a classic and will be read a hundred years from now. In him Mississippi and the Nation had a champion. In Mr. WITHERSPOON the producing masses of America had a stanch champion whose place is hard to fill. Whether one agreed with the man or not, all loved him and admired him. SAM WITHERSPOON stood out as a strong, singular character. Every man has his fault, but for one, I new saw any faults, because I loved the man. Oftentimes he would say to me, "Percy, excuse me", and he would not let me interrupt him in his process of reasoning.

I sometimes thought I could reach a conclusion or interject something in his argument, but he would always say "Excuse me." I sat still and listened and I always knew more at the end of his conversation than I did when he started. He had the most analytical mind I ever listened to or read after. In my judgment he was the greatest reasoner who ever stood on the floor of this House since I have been here. Mr. WITHERSPOON did not make many speeches on this floor, but he made them in the Democratic caucuses and in his office; he made them in the cloakroom, and what democracy there is in this House to-day is bound to have a real veneration and admiration for the memory and teachings of our departed colleague. Men from every State in this Union so soon as I returned to Washington a few days before Congress assembled expressed their deep regret and sorrow at the death of Mr. WITHERSPOON. Irrespective of party, Republicans who fought every inch of the ground on which Mr. WITHERSPOON stood absolutely admired and loved the man. They knew his character; they knew that he stood out a giant oak almost alone in his position. I could not follow Mr. WITHERSPOON'S reasoning on all of these great questions, but there never was a question that came before this House that I did not go into his office and argue it out with him. The important ship-purchase bill which was before the Senate for weeks before it came over to the House Mr. WITHERSPOON and I discussed in his office and in my office and in the little car when I would carry him out to my house, and there in my home in the presence of my wife we would argue. It was the same way on every deep question confronting the American people, and when it came for him to vote he voted his conscientious convictions, regardless of party whip, regardless of the effect of his vote so far as his popularity might be concerned in his district or in the State or in the Nation; he voted his honest convictions and voted, as he understood it, for the best interests of the American people.

He had a horror of the special-privilege legislation that had been in vogue in this Republic. He wanted to see all the American people put upon the same footing. He wanted equal justice to the poor, the rich, the high, and the low alike. A natural-born aristocrat, adorned with culture and refinement and deep learning, yet he was an absolute democrat in his manner, modes of life, conduct, and thought. No man had a deeper feeling for the toiling masses of this Republic than did Mr. WITHERSPOON.

And I for one know that my State, the State of Mississippi, has lost a great man, a great statesman, a philosopher, a Christian gentleman. I know that he is a loss to this body and a loss to the American people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any Member of the House who wishes to do so may be given the privilege of printing his remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and work of the late Mr. WITHERSPOON, and also that any Member who has spoken shall have the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE].

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

And then, in accordance with the resolution previously agreed to, the House (at 2 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, March 6, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 6, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, March 3, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

PRINTING OF SENATOR KENYON'S SPEECH ON CHILD LABOR.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on the 24th of February the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] made an address here in the Senate on the child-labor question, and it included a great many documents bearing on that subject. It seems to me his address becomes very valuable to one who wants to study the question. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it has always been against the rule of the Senate to make a public document of an address delivered by a Senator in the Senate. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska of course it can be printed at the Government Printing Office just as it is, by itself, and distributed by any Senator who wishes to send it out.

Mr. NORRIS. I know it can, but the Senator will appreciate this fact. I presume every Senator is getting a great many requests for copies, and no one Senator would have a sufficient number nor would he feel justified in going to the expense of having it printed. The printing would be quite expensive.

Mr. SMOOT. Any Senator can have as many copies printed as he wants. If the Senator from Iowa desires to have it printed in pamphlet form by itself——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. I say if he does, he can have just as many copies printed in that way as if it was printed as a public document.

I will say to the Senator it has been the universal rule, understood not only by the members of the Joint Committee on Printing upon the part of the Senate but also by the members on the part of the House, that the course proposed by the Senator shall not be adopted. I sincerely hope the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. SMOOT. On that ground I shall have to object, Mr. President; but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No matter about the ground. The Senator objects.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to be placed in a false position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, and the Secretary will report the pending amendment.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is that proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, at the end of line 23, after the word "granted," it is proposed to insert:

Nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connectios with the property to be acquired.

So as to read:

In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know there are a number of Senators interested in this amendment who are not in the Chamber. As there are very few Senators present, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Husting	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Smoot
Chilton	Jones	Owen	Sterling
Clapp	Kenyon	Page	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pittman	Swanson
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Poindexter	Thompson
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Tillman
Culberson	McCumber	Robinson	Vardaman
Cummins	McLean	Shafroth	Walsh
Curtis	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Warren
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Williams
Gallinger	Myers	Simmons	Works

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent from the Senate because of serious illness in his family. I desire this announcement to stand for the day. He is paired, however, with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. I should like that announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] are absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators having answer to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to have read an editorial from the New York Times of Sunday, March 5, bearing upon the subject which was under consideration last Friday, which, it seems to me, it would be very appropriate to answer in a very few words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

Mr. McCUMBER. The subject is under the heading "The flag on the Capitol."

The Secretary read as follows:

THE FLAG ON THE CAPITOL.

For some days, thanks to the multitudinous lies radiated over the country from the central source at Washington, Americans have been boiling with anger at the thought that not an American but a German Congress was sitting there. They knew that foreign intrigue and domestic malice were doing their worst to set the legislative branch against the Executive, to filch from the latter one of his constitutional powers, to weaken the President in a grave moment of international difficulty, to create the impression abroad that the United States Government was divided in opinion, that the people were on one side and the President on another.

They saw Senators and Representatives eager for a cowardly surrender of the right of Americans to travel on the high seas. They read the concocted tabulations showing a majority in Congress—in the House a majority of two to one—in favor of that surrender. They saw, with shame and anger, a Senator in the Senate Chamber rolling out unctuously a falsehood, which he took good pains not to inquire into, about the President's wish for war. They heard from the American ambassador to Germany of the erroneous or sophisticated opinion prevailing in Germany, of the injury done to the United States by replication in Berlin of the studiously propagated report that Congress was hostile to Mr. Wilson's submarine policy.

Not even in the days when earlier aliens and fomenters of sedition were making the United States the football of foreign interests has the United States seemed so pitiable. Then it was young, weak, unconsolidated, full of generous recent friendships and enmities. Now, in its height of power, had it become the puppet of a foreign influence, a child in the hands of a foreign master? Was its Congress not its own, but that master's? Dark days for Americans.

It seemed as if the Congress was ready to haul down the American flag from the Capitol, spit on it, run the black, white, and red up in its place. But Tuesday the President called on the Germans in Congress to stand up and be counted. They stood up in the Senate Friday, 14 in all, a sorry lot. The Senate stamped on the counsel of division and dishonor. The Senate was American. The German flag was not going up on the Capitol. There was still an America, instinct with national patriotism, hot to resent and prevent the sacrifice of the least tittle of American rights, calm and majestically strong in upholding the President, who was striving in stormy times to maintain peace, but with no diminution of national right, no stain upon national honor.

The Senate is American. It is for the House to prove amply and unmistakably by its vote on the McLemore resolution that it is also American. The cloud of lies is not yet wholly scattered. The German flag will still seem to be dangling from the Capitol staff until the House has acted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have always read with a great deal of interest the editorials of the New York Times. They are always aggressive, always strong. In this particular instance I must say, however, the editorial does not fairly represent the sentiment and the basis of the vote of those 14 Senators in the Chamber who believe that it is a high patriotic duty of the American people to do no act that would needlessly force this country into armed conflict.

Whenever we get ready for war, Mr. President, the editorial writer for the New York Times will find no divided sentiment in the Senate of the United States, and in my opinion very little division of sentiment among the people of the United States. But, Mr. President, if the writer of this article thinks for a single moment that the American people are hunting for an excuse to get into this European war, that they want Americans to expose themselves and to be killed so that we may be compelled to assert ourselves by armed conflict, he is sadly misinformed.

No, Mr. President; the country, while ever ready to defend our undoubted rights, does not want its citizens to needlessly lead it into this war. The sentiment of the people is patriotic, but it is not jingoistic. And, Mr. President, if this country is ever forced into war its victories will be achieved not by the bully or braggart, not by the jingo declaimers, but by the great army of true American patriots who are more concerned that their cause shall be a just right, approved by their hearts and their consciences, than a mere naked legal right.

Mr. President, no American has ever condoned or will condone the sinking of an unarmed indefensible merchant ship without first signaling for surrender, and without adequate protection of the lives of passengers and crew. That has now been conceded by all belligerents. The controversy has now narrowed down to a question as to whether an armed merchant vessel or a submarine should be permitted to shoot first. And without passing judgment on that question, but leaving it in the hands of the President, I insist that true American patriotism demands that so long as that disputed question has not been settled, so long as it is the subject of diplomatic negotiation and conference, no American citizen should by his needless act jeopardize the peaceful settlement of the question or precipitate a crisis, and no American who purposely does so, and no one who advises him to do so can claim to be governed by real, true patriotic motives toward his own country. The highest patriotism of the American people to-day is to prevent precipitating the country into an armed conflict during the negotiations concerning this most delicate question.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, when I heard the editorial read that the Senator from North Dakota sent to the Secretary's desk I wondered whether the writer of it belonged to a certain league that seems to be organized in the city of New York for a certain purpose, which is sending out documents urging that all means be taken possible to bring about a diplomatic rupture between this country and some of the belligerent nations.

This league is called "Citizens' League for America and the Allies," and one of its purposes is thus expressed:

> This league is formed to use all lawful means to put this Nation in a position of definite sympathy with the allies, and in an equally definite position of moral disapprobation of the purposes and methods of the Central Teutonic Empires.

Then it gives the names of the members of the committee, which I will ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The names referred to are as follows:

> Holker Abbott; Rev. W. H. van Allen, D. D.; William D. Austin; Gaspar G. Bacon; Philip Cabot; Richard C. Cabot, M. D.; Stephen Chase; William T. Councilman, M. D.; Raply Adams Cram; Rev. H. R. Deming; James V. Donnaruma; Rev. P. R. Frothingham; Henry Copley Greene; William Ernest Hocking; Charles C. Jackson; F. F. McLeod; Joseph B. Millet; Ralph Barton Perry; Arthur Stanwood Pier; Edgar Pierce; Chandler R. Post; Morton Prince, M. D.; George Haven Putnam; Josiah Royce; Alexander Sedgwick; Frederick C. Shattuck, M. D.; William Roscoe Thayer; George B. Upham; H. Langford Warren; Leo Wiener.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this document which this league sends out is an address delivered at Tremont Temple, Sunday, January 30, 1916, by Josiah Royce, LL. D., professor in Harvard University. He closes with these words—and I simply ask the people to judge whether or not he is working in the interest of the United States and of the people of the United States and of the neutrality which our President so wisely and patriotically urged us all to maintain some time ago:

> Let us do what we can to bring about at least a rupture of all diplomatic relations between our own Republic and those foes of mankind, and let us fearlessly await whatever dangers this our duty as Americans may entail upon us, upon our land, and upon our posterity. We shall not thus escape suffering, but we shall begin to endure as Belgium to-day endures, for honor, for duty, for mankind.

Mr. President, the 14 Senators referred to in this editorial have no other desire and no other purpose than to promote the welfare, the happiness, the peace, and the prosperity of the American people. They are not interested as citizens of this country in either side of this great controversy, but are trying to keep their country out of just what this league is trying to get us into.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, as one of those not numbered among "the immortal fourteen," I wish to say that in my opinion the editorial which was read at the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] does not reflect the views and was not written by a legitimate champion of the men—the sixty and odd Senators—who voted with the majority a few days ago. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that every Senator who then voted, no matter on which side, voted in accordance with what he thought was best for the American people.

I voted as I did because I think the Congress is not the proper forum at this time for the discussion of this question. The Constitution places in the hands of the President the responsibility for dealing with our foreign affairs; and I, as a Member of the Congress, no matter how I may differ from the President and from his administration on domestic questions, feel that it is not up to me to interfere in any way with his conduct of foreign affairs in accordance with the dictates of the Constitution and of the duties which the people have called upon him to perform.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be through in one moment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply wanted to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question at that point.

Mr. OLIVER. In one moment I shall yield to the Senator.

Mr. President, I deprecate such utterances as are contained in that editorial, and I decline to acknowledge that the men who give utterance to such expressions represent me in any way whatever. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am gratified to hear what the Senator from Pennsylvania has stated, because I believe it is the honest feeling of every Senator, no matter how he voted on that misunderstood resolution; but I wanted to ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator feel that in voting an opinion that the Executive might well warn American citizens not to travel on armed merchantmen is interfering with the President's constitutional prerogative in any way?

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all, Mr. President, if a Senator feels that it is his duty to give expression to that opinion. For my part, I do not feel that it is my duty to give expression to any opinion upon the subject at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the question I have propounded arose from the fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania seemed to intimate that in some way we were trying to encroach upon the prerogatives of the Executive. I have been utterly unable to see—I may be dense on the subject—how we were doing that in any way, if we simply felt and expressed the view that a warning of this kind might well be given to our people. That is all. That is the only thing I want to vote on. I believe such warning ought to be given, just as Sweden has given it, just as the President practically gave it in reference to Mexico; and I certainly would be one of the last Senators to take from the Executive any right that belongs to him or to hamper him in the discharge of his duty in trying to keep the country out of war. I do not want war, Mr. President. I want peace, and any vote I cast will be cast in that direction.

Mr. OLIVER. I realize that fully, Mr. President. I believe that that is the feeling of every Senator and of every Member of the House of Representatives. As to whether we should give expression to our views on this subject, as I said before, that simply marks an honest difference of opinion between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, about 10 days ago I received a letter from a constituent urging me to support the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and giving as a reason for making that request a precedent which had been set by the British Government during the war between Russia and Japan. I at that time made some investigation in the State Department and satisfied myself that no such order had ever been issued by the British Government; at least, that was the information which was given to me. I should not have referred to this subject but that on Saturday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] referred to it and discussed it at some length, presenting some documentary evidence showing that no such order had been issued. I then took the matter up again with the State Department in order that the Senate might have the benefit of such knowledge as the State Department had had upon the subject, and I now have from the Secretary of State a letter, which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
> Washington, March 6, 1916.
> The Hon. ATLEE POMERENE, > United States Senate.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your oral inquiry on Saturday last in regard to an official order reported to have been issued at Hongkong or Shanghai by British authorities warning British subjects not to travel on belligerent ships during the Russo-Japanese War, I am advised that no such order or warning has been published in the British official organ or in the North China Herald, of Shanghai, and that British representatives and consular officers were expressly instructed to abstain from giving any advice to merchants, etc., by a circular of February 15, 1904. It is understood that if any such warning was issued it was without the authority of His Majesty's Government and contrary to their instructions.
> Very sincerely, yours, ROBERT LANSING.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside on Saturday last. Is it necessary again to have it laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The so-called unfinished business is still under consideration.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana please explain his amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HUSTING. I request the Senator from Montana to explain the amendment now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is rather an unusual request. Evidently a sufficient number have seconded the demand for the yeas and nays. Let the Secretary call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, may the amendment be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated by the Secretary on the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I shall be glad briefly to respond to the request made by the Senator from Wisconsin, if the parliamentary situation permits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The parliamentary situation is such that the Senator can address the Senate if he sees proper to do so. However, let the amendment be stated, in compliance with the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 23, after the word "granted," it is proposed to insert:

Nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

So as to read:

In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, briefly the bill provides that after the expiration of the period of the permit, 50 years, the Government of the United States may, if it sees fit to do so, take over the property useful for or used in connection with the permit which is granted under the provisions of the bill upon paying the then fair value of the property. The amendment proposed by me is to the effect that the amount which is then to be paid by the Government, should it take over the property, shall be the cost of the same; that is to say, the cost of the dam, the diversion works, the generating works, and any water rights or rights of way; in other words, that the unearned increment, so to speak, shall accrue to the benefit of the people, instead of to the benefit of the corporation, which is granted the privilege under the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator from Montana object to amending his amendment by putting in the word "reasonable" before the word "cost"? I have this in mind: Sometimes money is expended which is foolishly expended, yet it enters into the cost.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that is true, Mr. President, but I have endeavored to be as reasonable as I could be in framing the amendment. The objection is made to the amendment that it is utterly unfair to the permittee. I want to give him what he has actually put in. However, if the amendment would be accepted by the Senator from Tennessee with the modification, I should be very glad to accede to it, but I apprehend it would not be.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I did not hear the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I suggested that the phrase employed be "reasonable cost," instead of "cost"; having this in mind, that it sometimes happens that money is improvidently expended in constructing a plant, and that money so expended should not be considered a part of the reasonable cost.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator's point fully illustrates the impropriety of adopting the amendment. For instance, I am informed there were mistakes made in connection with engineering problems involved in the Keokuk Dam, in Iowa, and in the Hales Bar Dam, in Tennessee, by reason of which the dams cost several million dollars more than originally estimated. Under this amendment the Government would have to pay for such mistakes several million dollars because of unwise and unskillful construction; but under the bill as it is drawn the idea of the Senator from Missouri would be carried out, because the bill now provides that the fair value of the property as it stands shall be paid when the Government or a new lessee or permittee takes it over. The amendment would also allow the Government or a new permittee to take it over for less than its then fair value, to the prejudice of the old company and its bondholders.

This amendment has been very elaborately debated. The principle involved in it is the same contained in one offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and in one offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], both of which were rejected by decided majorities. This is the third time it has been presented, although it is now in somewhat different language.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I think that the Senator ought to say that this was the first amendment that was offered upon this point.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator mean in point of time?

Mr. WALSH. In point of time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I rather think it was; but the others involved the same principle and have been voted down. I do not know which one of these three Senators is entitled to the honor of the suggestion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator ought to give the Senate the benefit of the facts. This amendment was proposed by me before any of the other amendments were offered.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have said so.

Mr. WALSH. The vote was not taken on it at that time at the request of the Senator from Tennessee that it go over. When a vote was to be taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] I suggested that it would be more logical and appropriate that a vote be taken on this amendment first, but the Senator from Tennessee objected to that. Now, it does not occur to me that the vote on this amendment ought to be prejudiced by the statement that the proposition has been voted on three times.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa which the Senator from Montana desired to have voted on, after a vote on his amendment, was a different amendment entirely from the one that I referred to in my first statement. The amendment to which I refer contained the principle of excluding certain values. The one to which the Senator refers, as I recall, did not have that in it, but provided for a review of all the rates for power allowed by the public-service commissions of the States and the Interstate Commerce Commission after the expiration of the permit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, I want to say that under this bill, as now written, the matter will be referred to the courts. It provides that the United States on taking over the property, or that the new permittee in taking it over, will pay the fair value to be agreed upon, and if not agreed upon then the district court in the district where the property is located is given jurisdiction to determine the fair value. The "fair value" means the just value; so that the rule would be just as it is now applied under the Constitution to property when taken over in the exercise of the right of eminent domain for a public purpose. Certainly that is just and fair, and that is what the bill provides; and the amendment provides for payment of less than that fair value or just value. The bill expressly excludes the value of the permit granted by the Government; and if it did not exclude it, it would be the same thing, because the permit would have expired by its own limitation. But it does expressly exclude it, and the rights acquired under the bill are not to be considered at all in estimating the fair value.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am moved to say a word because there is a misapprehension with regard to the amendment which I offered, which the Senator from Tennessee says is somewhat similar to or practically like the amendment now pending and which was offered by the Senator from Montana. The amendment which I presented, and upon which a vote was had, provided that the property which related to the development of power or the use of water for other purposes than navigation should be valued as physical property; that is, that the value of the physical property should be ascertained. That, of course, would exclude all intangible values, or values that were created by the business and by other franchises or grants. It is not quite the same. The Senator from Montana proposes to ascertain the cost of the property. While I intend to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, I do not think it is quite as fair to the public as the one which I offered, because the cost of the property may be greater than its value as physical property. But it is still, I think, to be preferred as compared with the provision that is now in the bill and to which it is offered as an amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, speaking on this bill for a few moments, I frankly state that I do so with a great deal of hesitancy and with considerable regret. The bill has been discussed here until the Senate is out of patience with it. No one has been more derelict than myself in giving attention to the measure. I happen to have been so situated that it was impossible for me to be here during the early hours of the discussion. In addition to that the bill has had the careful thought of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], for whose opinion as a lawyer and for whose judgment as a lawmaker I entertain the very highest regard. But, Mr. President, I am afraid we shall make a serious mistake, and one the consequences of which we shall not escape for many years, if we pass this bill in its present form.

There is a technical side to nearly all legislation and there is a practical side to nearly all legislation. Technically this bill may be said not to deprive a State of the rights it now possesses. Technically it may be said that this bill does not grant a perpetual franchise; and yet I believe that the practical effect of the bill, if passed in its present form, will be to deprive every State of this Union of the right to control the water powers within its borders and that practically it will result in the creation of perpetual franchises granted by the Government of the United States. If it does either one of those things, then it certainly needs some radical amendment.

Let us follow it a moment as a practical problem. Here is a river in a State, technically a navigable stream; practically it is not navigable, but it is a great water power. The State can not grant the privilege of building a dam, and consequently the State is powerless to grant the right to build a great plant of any kind to be operated by the dam, for whoever controls the right to build the dam controls the entire proposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I just want to get the Senator's position. Does he mean that under the bill the State can not grant the right to build a dam?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Or under existing law?

Mr. REED. I am stating the situation as it is now, and I propose to follow it on and show how this bill affects it. The moment this bill is passed—and I am going to use the State of Iowa for an illustration—a lot of gentlemen can go down to Delaware or to New Jersey or to Arizona or to any other State having liberal corporation laws and they can organize a corporation to construct a dam and put in a dam on a river in the State of Iowa. They can go to the Secretary of War and obtain from the Secretary of War a permit to build that dam. They are not obliged to come to the State of Iowa for anything. They can thereupon proceed to construct their dam upon that stream without the let or the hindrance of the State of Iowa, and they can absorb completely to themselves that great water power situated within the State of Iowa; and the State of Iowa is as powerless from the practical standpoint to protect itself as it has been powerless to protect itself in matters of interstate commerce, which come distinctly within the purview and authority of the Federal Government.

I do not desire to go into any technicalities about that or any slight variations. There are certain States whose laws provide that a foreign corporation must file its articles of incorporation in that State, and so forth; but the great, broad problem stands before us that if you pass this bill a corporation desiring to absorb the water power of a State can gain its permit from the Secretary of War to build a dam. Having built that dam, no other person can build a dam within such distance as will interfere with it, and the entire water power of a State can be taken over by one or more corporations without coming to the State authorities for any grant or permit or privilege. It is the most far-reaching, the most sweeping proposition touching matters of this nature that has been presented to Congress since I have had the honor to sit in the Senate.

I want to suggest to the learned author of this bill—and I do it because I want to see something done that will release these great water powers—an amendment providing that no such corporation shall be thus authorized until it has obtained the consent of the authorities of the State to build the dam and to construct the works incident to it. That will keep within the power of the State the ability to control.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The laws of the States upon this subject may be entirely different. I have been struck with section 13 of the bill for the development of water power on public lands. I can not agree to the conclusions of the Senator from Missouri in regard to this bill. I know he can grasp and analyze the provisions of the bill as well as any Senator in the Chamber; but, as he says, he has not given it very great consideration.

The present law does prohibit the States or anyone else from building dams or other structures in navigable waters. This bill liberalizes the present law, and such is the intention of it. But here is the section to which I want to call the attention of the Senator in the bill for the development of water power on public lands to which I referred:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water.

What does the Senator think of that?

Mr. REED. I do not think it covers the case.

Mr. SHIELDS. What does the Senator think, then, of the clause providing that the companies making the developments shall be subject to the laws of the States—an express provision to that effect—that they shall be subject to taxation by the States, and that their rates and business shall be regulated by the State public-utility commission? There are express provisions in this bill covering all those things.

Mr. REED. But there is not, as far as I have read the bill—and if I am in error the Senator will correct me; no one will more gladly yield the point——

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will read the bill, he will find those provisions in it broadly and clearly.

Mr. REED. Oh, I understand that what the Senator says is in the bill; but is there in this bill a provision that before a dam can be built across a stream within a State the State authorities shall give their express consent?

Mr. SHIELDS. There is an express provision that all these permits shall be subject to the laws of the States where the property is located. Now, Congress can not enact a law that the States shall examine these permits and give their consent, but the States can enact such laws. Some of them have such laws, and all of them can have them, so the laws can be enacted by the only legislative bodies empowered to do so. Congress can not enact a law requiring States to grant permits to develop the water power in streams or to exercise any other police power.

Mr. REED. But will the Senator call my attention to the clause to which he has just referred, because I am very sure there is not in this bill the idea that I think ought to be put in it?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will try to do. The power of the States over the companies making these developments does not all appear in any one clause, but it appears in different clauses of the bill. All that I stated, however, is expressly provided for. Let me read one of the clauses to which I referred. It is to be found on page 11, line 22.

Mr. REED. Of the reprint?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; of the first print.

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any State in which such dam with its appurtenant property is located, or in which such business is to be conducted, from making and enforcing any lawful regulations, with respect to the property or business of such grantee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know that provision is in the bill, but that provision does not reach the point I have in mind. Understand, I am discussing the proposition that the dam can be built within the borders of a State without the permission of the State, and that we propose to grant to the proprietors of that dam what I regard as a perpetual charter. So the question is presented in this way: Without the consent of the State, the dam can be built, and it can be maintained forever, the State having a right of regulation. That is quite a different thing from giving the State the right in the first instance to say whether the dam shall be built, and, when the grant is made, to insist upon conditions being placed in the grant for the protection of the citizens of the State and the State itself.

Let us take a plain illustration of it. Here is a city having control of its streets, having the authority and right to permit a street car company to build its tracks over the streets or to withhold that privilege. That city when it makes a grant can then impose such conditions in the grant as will fully protect the city. It can impose conditions that are not found in the general law, that do not come within the principles of regulatory power. But if the State should take away from the city the right to grant the franchise in the first instance, and the State itself grant the franchise, and grant a perpetual franchise, and thus give the company the right to take over and absorb the streets, a very different question will be presented to that city in handling that corporation and in getting justice done to the public from that which would be presented if it had the right to refuse permission to come at all, or, when it did come, to impose the conditions upon which it should come. Now, I say to the Senator that is a very grave question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the Senator from Missouri believe that the Government of the United States can authorize the construction of a dam in a navigable river for the purpose of improving the navigability of that river without the consent of the State?

Mr. REED. I do think we can do it; but when you ask me whether I think we ought to do it, whether we ought to give to private corporations the right to absorb all the water powers there are in the United States upon navigable streams, whether we ought to grant them what I shall undertake to demonstrate is in effect a perpetual franchise, whether we ought to deprive the States within which the streams are located of any right to say that they shall or shall not build, with the terms and conditions upon which they shall build—when we come to that question, Mr. President, we ought to pause, and simply because we have a right to say that a dam shall or shall not be built we should not undertake to deprive the States of this country of what is their legitimate power and function.

I am afraid we are taking action here that may result in every great water power in this country going into the hands of two or three concerns. I am afraid we are taking action here the effect of which will be felt long after we are all in our graves. Now, why will not the sponsors of this bill consent to put into it a plain simple statement to this effect?—

Provided, however, That no such dam shall be constructed within the borders of a State unless and until the proper authorities of that State shall grant the permission of the State.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, although the bill has been subjected to great scrutiny and almost every line of it attacked here during the last month there has been no suggestion of the kind ever made. The Senator has offered no amendment proposing such a provision.

Mr. REED. I am offering it now.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will prepare one, I have no doubt we can agree. I can not speak for the committee, but I think the bill means what he wants, and I have no objection to an express statement of it.

Mr. REED. Very well; if I have made that much by this 5 or 10 minutes' talk it is the most valuable 5 or 10 minutes' talk, in my judgment, I have every perpetrated, and I will prepare the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator had made the suggestion in advance, doubtless we would have arrived at an agreement.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator does not take it as an unkindness on my part that I made it in that way, because I would not have the Senator——

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly not; but the Senator and I have discussed the bill several times and he made no such objection to it. I had thought it covered the very proposition he is now advocating.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator from Missouri if he thinks there is any reason why the vote on the pending amendment should be delayed?

Mr. REED. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). Upon this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I desire to state that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I do not know how the senior Senator from New York would vote upon this question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], but knowing his views upon this matter I feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], but as I am informed he would vote as I intend to vote I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. WILLIAMS's name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, as has just been stated. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BORAH. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. BRADY] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I desire this statement to stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. My pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] I transfer to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). Before the announcement is made I desire to say that I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], but I am privileged to vote on matters connected with this bill in his absence, and I have voted "nay."

I wish also to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN];

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. I have another amendment to offer, to be inserted at this point, and I have no doubt it will be acceptable to the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 23——

Mr. SHIELDS. Of the new print or the old print?

The SECRETARY. Of the old print, page 10, line 23, after the word "granted," insert:

Nor for any rights which the grantee may have acquired gratuitously from any State or subdivision thereof.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to be inserted in what part of the bill?

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 6, after the word "granted."

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator from Montana if he means franchises that may have been granted the permittees?

Mr. WALSH. Any rights of any kind. I had particularly in mind water rights; and rights of way as well.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the amendment applied merely to franchises, I would have no objection; the company then goes out of business; but if it is intended to include property rights, as I understand the Senator to say it does——

Mr. WALSH. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I object to it because it is identical with the amendment just rejected.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Tennessee will give me his attention for a minute——

Mr. SHIELDS. I certainly will.

Mr. WALSH. I think I shall be able to dispossess him of that idea.

The amendment just voted down proposed to provide that for the cost only of the diversion works, the generating works, the land on which the same is situated no value shall be allowed; also, the cost of the right of way and the cost of water rights. That was voted down; that is disposed of; so that it is "the value" under the bill.

The present amendment has no reference to those things at all, but as I explained the other day, under the laws of all the States where the doctrine of appropriation prevails the States accord the right gratuitously to anyone to appropriate the water of the stream. It costs him absolutely nothing. The State gives it to the party gratuitously. Now, those rights in the course of time, although they were originally acquired gratuitously, grow enormously valuable. It did not occur to me that the Senator wanted the permittees under the grant to get the value of those rights as they shall be after 50 years from now. That would give to them a free gift from the State just the same as we are giving them the free gift of the right to dam the stream. All the States have secured great grants of land from the Government of the United States. They give gratuitously the right to all these enterprises to construct ditches over these lands wherever necessary, to erect their transmission lines over the lands. They do not ask them a cent for it; they give them the privilege to do so, but in 50 years from now those privileges will be in many instances of great value.

Those are the things that I thought the Senator would be quite willing should go back to the State when the permit of the grantee expires at the end of the 50 years—that they should go back to the people without the necessity of paying for them—and I feel very sure that if the Senator understood the situation I should not make this appeal to him in vain. For instance, I will read from section 33 of the act of our eleventh legislative assembly, enacted in the year 1909, touching the disposition of our State lands, as follows:

RIGHT OF WAY FOR PUBLIC USE.

SECTION XXXIII.

The State board of land commissioners may grant the right of way across or upon any portion of State lands, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for any ditch, reservoir, railroad, private road, telegraph or telephone line, or for any other public use, as defined in the code of civil procedure: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to grant authority to convey any such land except for the purposes above set forth: And provided further, That whenever lands granted for any of the purposes mentioned in this section shall cease to be used for such purposes, said lands shall revert to the State, upon notice to that effect to the person to whom such grant was made, served at his last known post-office address.

So that so long as this is used the State does not claim it. It is only when it is no longer used that it goes back to the State. If it is continued to be used at the end of the 50 years, I simply want to have it provided that in taking over the property from the grantee you would have to pay him for these things that the State gave him as a perfectly free grant, just the same as we grant him the privilege accorded in this proposed act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill provides how the determination of the value of the property shall be arrived at in these words:

In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted.

Mr. President, if a valuable grant of any kind is given to the grantee by the Government of the United States, no such grant is to be taken into consideration in determining the value of the property at the end of the lease.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has offered an amendment which goes beyond the acquiring of property by grant from the Government and undertakes to determine that no property granted by a State shall be taken into consideration, and he cites the question of a State water right.

Mr. President, a water right in the Western States can only be secured by the beneficial use of the water. It is beneficial use that counts, and it is beneficial use that gives title to the water. If it is not used by the grantee, a right is worthless; and it seems to me it would be out of place to inject into this bill a proposition of that kind.

I think the States themselves can take care of any question affecting any right that may be granted to a person applying for a lease under the provisions of this bill. It is enough for the Congress of the United States to pass laws affecting the action of the Government of the United States and the lessee, and I think it is improper and out of place to undertake to inject into this bill provisions that relate to matters which are wholly within the jurisdiction of the State. I therefore sincerely hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to hear from the Senator from Tennessee, now that I have made an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was proceeding to answer the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, this bill provides for the payment of the fair value of the property when it is taken over by the United States or a new permittee, to whom the Secretary of War may grant a permit. There is much talk about taking rights from the people, and of turning them back to the people. This amendment does not propose to turn them back to the people of the States where the navigable waters flow, if such a thing could be accomplished by the amendment, but to deduct so much from the fair value of the property when it is taken over under the provisions of the bill, either for the benefit of the United States—which means the people of the whole Union—taking over something that belongs, say, to the people of Tennessee, along the Tennessee River, and giving it to every man in the United States, or to deduct it from the value of the property for the benefit of the new permittee, to whom the Secretary of War may transfer it. Where you take something from the value of the property when it is taken over and thus depreciate it, that value never reaches the people of that community or the State where it belongs.

Take the difference between what the Senator from Montana is advocating here and what he advocates in the Ferris bill for the rent of the public lands. The one half of the rent of the lands goes into the treasury of the State where the water power is located and the other half goes into the reclamation fund—which is the same thing—in the public-land States, and they get the benefit of the whole of it.

The Senator from Montana remembers the address he made at the Portland conference, when he said he never would agree to charges upon developments in his State to go to the whole people of the United States, and called attention to the fact that the rents for the public lands provided in that bill would go into the State treasury or the reclamation fund; but here he wants a different principle engrafted upon this bill, that which applies to other than public-land States.

Mr. President, I do not think that this is fair or that it is just. I think that these people ought to be paid the fair value for their property. If this is a property right which was acquired, the companies are entitled to be paid for it, regardless of the source or of the title of the right. If it is something for which they should not be paid, the court will disallow it. In one case it was held that the property had greatly appreciated in value; in fixing the rates—which is substantially the same rule which would be followed in taking over the property—the court would not consider an increase so great as to be unconscionable. The machinery and power of a court of equity is broad enough to do justice between these companies, the Government, and the new permittee in all cases, dependent upon the particular facts of each case and the conditions existing at the time the property is taken over. We ought to leave it to the courts; and these little provisions hampering the courts in doing justice between the parties ought not to be placed in this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is quite obvious from the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee that he has not yet grasped the purport of my amendment. I am not able to make it any clearer, however, than I have done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], but, for the reason stated on the previous vote, I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] who is unavoidably absent. If he was here, he would vote "nay"; and if I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as was announced on the preceding vote and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COLT. Although I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], I am at liberty to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to announce that I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. On account of that pair I withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS). I am just informed by the colleague of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] that I am at liberty to vote upon the amendment, and I vote "nay."

Mr. POMERENE. I am requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] because of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]; and

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 33, as follows:

So Mr. WALSH'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute amendment to the pending bill. I will not have the Secretary read it, because it is long; but I propose to discuss it at this time, if that is proper.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, as I understand, that is a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it is time to offer that amendment until the friends of the bill have perfected it.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand that the friends of the bill have perfected the bill in so far as they propose to do so.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no. There are several important amendments yet; one, at least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wisconsin is not offering his amendment to be voted upon now, but is sending it to the desk in order that notice may be given of the fact that at the proper time he will offer it. Is that correct?

Mr. HUSTING. My proposition was to discuss it at this time and to offer it later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can discuss almost anything.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I should like to suggest to him that he discuss his amendment at the time he expects it to be voted upon. I was not aware that the committee had any further amendments they wanted to offer. I had a consultation with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] in regard to offering an amendment providing for the development of the Great Falls proposition. I had an understanding with those Senators that I would not offer that amendment until after the substitute had been voted upon. If the Senator from Minnesota insists, I suppose he can require that we offer amendments to the bill with a view of perfecting it before the substitute is voted upon, but I would rather——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think his amendment is of such a character that it would come in just as well after the vote on the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator refers to my amendment?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not want to have any misunderstanding; that was all. I think I have a right to offer it either before or afterwards. I had that understanding with the Senator from Wisconsin and also with the Senator from Tennessee, and it was satisfactory, and I should like to have it understood that we are to do it in that order, unless somebody else objects.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin if he desires to present his substitute at this time. I have an amendment to offer that is intended to perfect the bill and which I have been holding until other amendments of the same general character have been disposed of. I should like to offer it before the Senator from Wisconsin technically offers his substitute, but I have no desire to postpone any discussion that he may desire to present on his substitute.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, for the committee I prefer that all amendments be offered before the substitute of the Senator; but I have no objection whatever to the Senator from Wisconsin proceeding to discuss his substitute, as I understand he desires to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Tennessee mean the amendment that I have proposed to offer, providing for the development of the Great Falls?

Mr. SHIELDS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment that I will propose will only add a new section to the bill, and I wish to avoid having to offer it twice.

Mr. SHIELDS. It does not affect the remainder of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. If the substitute of the Senator from Wisconsin should be agreed to, I will offer it then. If it is defeated, I will offer it anyway.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall offer no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. If I were required to offer it first, I might be under the necessity of offering it the second time.

Mr. SHIELDS. There will be no objection to the Senator taking the course he desires.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. The Senator from Wisconsin has a substitute which he desires to offer. Any amendment which goes to perfecting the bill would, of course, take precedence of the substitute; but as there is no amendment pending at this moment, the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is in order. If any Senator has an amendment whereby to perfect the bill, he can offer it at this time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, for the purpose of perfecting the bill, or, rather, improving it. I do not think it will perfect it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Meanwhile, the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. He can not be taken off his feet for the purpose of offering an amendment; and under the rules of the Senate he can discuss almost anything.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], as to whether the committee desires to propose further amendments to be voted upon in order to perfect the bill.

Mr. CHILTON. I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. The committee is wholly unable to answer the question. It is impossible to foretell what a suggestion from some Senator might cause the committee to do.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I shall proceed to discuss the proposed amendment at this time, and propose a vote upon it at such time as it may be in order.

This debate has been a protracted one, and I would well hesitate to occupy the floor and the time of the Senate for any length of time were it not for the fact that the importance of the subject, in my opinion, justifies it and demands it.

As has been said by a number of Senators who have addressed the Senate upon this subject, the importance of the bill can not be overestimated. The country is greatly interested in it. The political parties have adopted resolutions in their platforms bearing on it, and the country is aroused about it. I might add that the Democratic Party, in its last platform, adopted a plank calling attention to the importance of this great subject; and for that reason, it having challenged the attention of the people and of the various political parties, it is a matter not to be lightly decided or lightly cast aside.

There are two lines of thought on this subject. There are those who believe that licenses should be issued to promoters and to those companies who desire to develop our water powers on terms so generous, so oblivious to the interests of the people, for the purpose, they say, of causing immediate development. To them, time is of the essence; and if they can get anybody on any terms to step in and develop and take over a water power, they will hand it to them, and there will be no questions asked. In other words, these men believe that it is for the best interest of the country to develop these water powers immediately and expect the public in a general way to content themselves with reaping some benefit as an incident to such development. They belong to that school of thought which teaches that if you look out for the captains of industry of a country, if you look out for capital, as it were, the benefits will trickle down and through to those below. The other line of thought, and the one that I try humbly to follow, is that when you take care of the just measures of the people first, that when justice is done to them, that when they prosper then capital will profit and the captains of industry prosper. That, I believe, is good Democratic doctrine, and therefore I believe that in disposing of a great natural resource it should be disposed of in such a way that the benefit to the people shall be made certain; that it shall not be left to those who engage in this business to give the public benefits from it, but that they should be secured in these benefits by the Government itself.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Is the substitute which he is now canvassing the one that was offered on February 25?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes, sir; February 25.

Mr. WALSH. Or is it another substitute?

Mr. HUSTING. No, sir. It is the one of February 25.

Mr. WALSH. I was laboring under the impression that the Senate had taken a vote on the substitute offered by the Senator on February 25.

Mr. HUSTING. No, sir; not on the substitute amendment. No vote was ever taken on that, to my knowledge. At least, no vote was taken while I was here.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there was a suggestion that the Senator offer it at one time, but some one asked him to lay it aside. There has been no vote on the substitute, as I understand.

Mr. HUSTING. There has been no vote on this substitute that I know of.

It seems to me this great question should be decided primarily with the interests of the public in mind. Their interests should be paramount. Their interests should be first considered; and then such benefits as may incidentally flow from the proper administration of this sort of an enterprise should be given to those who are made the agencies of the Government in carrying out this policy.

The primary object of this improvement ought to be decided upon. What are we doing this for? What is the object? What is the primary purpose?

I was greatly interested in the bill proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]—a waterways proposition—and I was truck with the general scheme proposed. It shows a great and proper conception of what the waterways mean or may mean to this country when properly handled. His bill calls for a very large appropriation, an appropriation that may or may not be made at this time. I am not holding a brief for that bill now, but I do want to point out a few of the features of that bill, because I think this subject of water power should be approached from that angle.

I have here a map illustrating the scheme of the bill of the Senator from Nevada. This map divides the country into the several districts in which the bill proposes to make improvements and apportions the appropriation provided for. These improvements are for the purpose, as is stated there, of preventing floods and of regulating the flow of water, building dikes, piers, and improvements of that kind, and various other things. It shows the great waterways of the country. It shows the great watershed known as the Mississippi Valley, which practically drains the entire country between the ranges of mountains. All of the tributaries of that great stream have their rise between the east and west mountain ranges, and from the Great Lakes down, east and west, the waters gather from almost every State and pour themselves into and down the Mississippi River into the Gulf.

It is proposed to enter into this work primarily to protect the lower Mississippi States from floods, to build dikes and things of that kind. You may build dikes as high as you please and as strong as the hills, and yet you can not prevent floods if you have more water coming into your river channel or bed than will flow through without piling up. There is only one way in which floods can be prevented, and that is by treating the trouble in the right kind of way. You can not cure floods by treating the symptoms; you have got to treat the causes of the trouble. You can not prevent floods by building dikes and building works of that kind. I think you have got to go to the headwaters of the streams, into the lakes, into the basins, the natural reservoirs, the reservoir regions, and build your dams there, and check the waters so that they may be held there in times of freshets, and released in the drier season, when they are needed.

I went into this matter a little at length the other day, but I think it is worth while to discuss it further, because it has a bearing on this whole matter. In the large rivers in the North, in Minnesota, in Wisconsin, and, as was shown here, in Maine, there are a great many lakes—thousands of them. These lakes are natural reservoirs and constitute the headwaters of all the streams that flow from the northern United States into the Mississippi Valley. These lakes have small outlets. I have in mind a lake in northern Wisconsin that is 7 miles long, 3 miles across, and has a depth in some places of 60 and 70 feet and even 100 feet. Its outlet, known as the upper branch of the Manitowish River, is narrow, probably not over 15 or 16 feet. A dam could be built across that outlet in such a way as to raise the waters several feet and impound those waters in this lake at a very little expense—a few hundred dollars. Now, what you could do to that lake you can do to every lake in northern Wisconsin that has an outlet and whose waters finally find their way to the Mississippi River. You can do that in Minnesota. You can do it in the case of any lake within the Mississippi watershed that has an outlet and whose waters are tributary to the Mississippi River.

If you do that, what do you accomplish? In the first place, you increase the storage capacity of these lakes millions and billions of cubic feet. You take the waters and impound them and prevent them in time of high water from going down the Mississippi River to flood the southern part of the United States. You conserve the water fully for your use later on for water powers and for navigation just when needed, and you are regulating the stream flow in such a way that you prevent all the harm it can do and save all the good it can do with a minimum of expense. What causes a flood? A panic of waters, as it were? Too many people in a crowded theater madly trying to get out of a narrow door at one time jams the passageway, and too much water gathered together at a given outlet and piling up over the bed or the banks of the river or channel causes a jam of water—a flood. To impound the waters at their respective sources, to check them at intervals down the stream, to control them from source to mouth, to make every stream tributary to the main stream a part of one great system controlled by one centralized power, have continuous and permanent control and jurisdiction of the whole waterways system and thus provide for a steady and orderly exit of the waters through a proper channel, is the the way and, in my opinion, the only way, to prevent and cure floods in the great Mississippi River.

The system must be so constructed and managed that when water is too plentiful it can be held back in reserve, thus permitting the ordinary run-off down the stream to operate the water wheels and to permit navigation and also thus preventing floods; and then when the water in the flood region begins to recede and goes down below the needs of navigation and below the needs of the water power above operated, then to permit the release of the waters, waters that would otherwise have gone over or through water-power dams and have been wasted and what would have come through by floods. By holding them you help the water power and you help navigation. Thus it would work nothing but good. There is nothing inconsistent or incompatible in purposes or in the arrangement with the construction of a system designed to prevent floods, to promote water-power operation, and to permit navigability, and to save water for irrigation. All these things can be harmoniously operated under the same system to the advantage of all and scarcely to the disadvantage of any.

I am only making this statement to show the angle from which I think this matter of water-power development ought to be approached, not as the end in itself, but as the means to an end, because when you impound the waters in these navigable reservoirs and go down below the stream and erect dams for further storage reservoirs along the navigable line of the stream, you increase the poundage of the water, so that you add to the efficiency and capacity of your headwater reservoirs, and every dam that you put in as a potential water power.

This can only be done efficiently and wisely by looking at it from the standpoint of the whole country. I, for one, believe that the paramount jurisdiction over the improvement of navigation and over the development of water power should be in the hands of the United States Government, and that every bill pertaining to water-power development, pertaining to irrigation, pertaining to navigation, should be a link in the chain of development that sooner or later must come if we are going to capitalize and make our great water power an asset and an instrument of good and advantage to the whole country. Any water-power bill that checks, hinders, interferes, obstructs, or is out of harmony with this scheme, in my judgment, is a bill that should be defeated.

Every dam that is put in and turned over to private individuals purely for private property is something that does not fit in and is out of order with the system that sooner or later this country will have to construct, devise, and will have to build and maintain. I claim that the committee bill is entirely incompatible in its provisions for any such control or management as outlined above, and contend, on the other hand, that the substitute I offer is in entire harmony with such a system.

Instead of taking these up section by section I desire to point out the differences in the two bills and endeavor to show the advantages of this substitute amendment and what I consider the dangerous features of the bill proposed by the committee.

The bill proposed by the committee, in my judgment, is a bill that has for its purpose primarily the promotion of water-power development, with practically no provision of an adequate nature for preserving the public rights or the Government rights in these waters. I think it was framed upon the plan and upon the theory that the people have little, if any, interest in navigable streams except their navigability and that the water powers incident to their improvement should be given to whomsover we may choose to favor for as much as they can get out or make out of them and that the future will take care of itself, as far as the people's interest therein is concerned.

This substitute amendment is drawn with a theory of preserving the right of the Government and the people of the United States as the primary consideration and keep, in so far as possible, the control of such powers in the Government and States and upon such advantageous terms to the public as may reasonably insure the timely development of such power. We attempt to control the rates, the service, the business, and eventually the power itself. In other words, we do not think that time is the essence in this matter. We think the value of this resource is the thing of essence in the matter; that it would be better to develop these water powers even slowly than that every interest that the public has therein shall be preserved. We believe that this tremendous system of waterways should be conserved, this tremendous force that is just about getting on its feet, the hydroelectric power, a power which is most assuredly going to revolutionize the industries and business and commerce of this country, which is the very juice, the essence, from which industrial development must spring and must receive its activity, which is the heart of the whole industrial and economic system of this country, and which is going to send out its energies into every field of business activity and endeavor. This energy, this essence, that is soon going to move every wheel of industrial and economic progress in this country and propel every conveyance, both on land and sea. We have this power within our very grasp, within our control, and the question is, What are we going to do with it? Are we going to delegate this thing of great value to men to use primarily for their own business and let the public get whatever incidental benefits may flow from it, or are we going to insist that that thing of value shall never slip out of our fingers, but shall be kept within our grasp, within our control, so that if we make any mistakes in the details of this delegation of power it will be only temporary and we still retain the power to remedy it in time?

There is another feature to this. Have we any right, as trustees of the people of the United States to tie up these resources forever? Have we any right to surrender powers that we have, powers that have been delegated to us as the representatives of the people of this country, so that they will be beyond the reach of posterity? In other words, have we the right to legislate for all eternity or should we legislate in such a manner that some time in the future the representatives of the people may be able to legislate in the light of those times and their then necessities?

Now, I wish to take up some of the details of this substitute bill in their order. I may say that the substitute provides that licenses may be issued to public utilities. The committee bill, by adding the word "individuals," permits the development of these water powers by individuals, political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, and corporations, companies, and associations—that is, for private purposes.

But for public-utility purposes the following applies:

Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States.

So you see the committee bill allows the development and divides those who are permitted to make the development into two classes—first, for private use; secondly, for public-utility purposes.

A great deal of the discussion here on the part of the friends of the bill has been on the line that they have adequately taken care of the public by regulating rates. Under this bill, however, there is nothing to prevent every water power in the United States from getting into the hands of individuals or corporations for private use and private profit. There is nothing in the bill that would prevent an individual from engaging in any business he desires and from receiving a license under this act for the whole term of 50 years and longer or until his license is revoked by conditions that I think are impossible or almost impossible of meeting. He has gotten this privilege and you can not get it away from him, and you can not regulate his rates, you can not regulate the product, you can not regulate him at all. You turn over to him a weapon with which he can kill every competitor he has without making any return at all to the people who gave him the weapon.

How are you going to regulate a man who goes into the business of manufacturing nitrates or explosives or boots and shoes or paper or anything else? If he wants to go into it, or if he gets into one business, what is going to prevent him from going into another business under this proposed act? Nothing. As to individuals he has just the same right to this license as anybody else, and he can go into any business, as I said, that he wants to; he can use his power for any purpose that he wants; he can go into one business and then can stop that and go into another business; and unless he goes into the public-utility business—and there is no guaranty that he shall; there is no request or requirement that he shall—you have as to him and as to every such development absolutely put the enterprise entirely out of your control and in the hands of one to be used by him purely for private purposes and profit. You can not even regulate the price of his product. I say, you have given him a weapon by which he can absolutely put his competitor who does not enjoy those privileges out of business. You have helped one man and have injured another, and the one you have helped at the expense of his competitor gives nothing by way of compensation for your help.

If you hook them up, enough of them under one head—and I will come to that a little later—if you get enough of these manufacturers together to hook up their powers, there is nothing by which you can control their joint product. There is nothing by which you can hold them from fixing their price for their own products and of absolutely ruling the market; not to the advantage of the people, because they can drive their competitors out of business, and they can fix a price for that product such as they see fit, subject, of course, only to the antitrust laws.

The second class is that of public utilities, and the bill describes those to whom these rights are given. The chairman of the committee and other Senators who have spoken on this matter said the municipalities have a preference. I want to point out that in the substitute which I have proposed the municipalities do have a preference. They are given a preference in so many words. The State is given a preference in the water power if they wish to develop it, and a municipality is given a preference if the development is under the State. But under the committee bill a municipality has no preference. A private utility has the same preference as a municipality has, no more and no less. So I do not think a municipality has a preference under the bill proposed by the committee. As I said before, they are given no preference but are put on the same plane as utilities.

The bill I have proposed also makes the distinction in regard to the size of the development. All dams whose capacity shall be less than 1,000 horsepower shall be developed under State regulation, and subject, of course, to such regulations as the United States shall provide. That provision is put in for the reason that smaller developments should be made and the steps for making the smaller developments should be made easy. If a person desires to develop 500 horsepower he should not be compelled to come down here to Washington to get a permit, but should be able to go to some State agency and get it.

That is the first distinction, in that respect, between the bill proposed by the committee and the substitute, because the committee bill gives Congress every license for a water power, no matter how small it may be, to go to Washington to get it.

Now, I want to talk about the difference in certain essential features of this bill. Among the essential features, I place the period in which it is going to run, the question of compensation, the recapture clause, and some other features of the bill.

Before going any further I want to state another provision in the substitute that does not appear in the committee bill. It is a provision by which any developer or any licensee under the act makes a contract with the United States that he accepts his license with the conditions attached. In other words, the basis for the license is a contract, and the whole transaction is a contractual one. This is important because it eliminates some of the arguments made by the friends of the bill.

It is my contention that the right of the United States to impose certain conditions is based, first, on a contractual right, the United States having the right to prohibit the building of dams across navigable streams, and having a right to prohibit it entirely has a right to permit it under such conditions as it sees fit to impose. If it has the right to prohibit it entirely certainly it can permit it under certain conditions which it lays down. When anyone comes to the Government and wants a license to build a dam across a navigable stream he recognizes the right of the United States, in the first place, to prohibit him from building that dam without permission, and, in the second place, he recognizes that it may lay down certain conditions upon which he may receive this right. He comes, furthermore, asking for a certain privilege, a valuable privilege, which the United States can give to any one of a number of citizens but as a matter of fact can not give to all.

Now, you have a certain water-power site that is particularly adapted to this business; but, as a matter of fact, every riparian owner has a potential water power of some kind. It is only a question as to whether it is a good one. One riparian owner has just as much right to build a dam across his land, or where he owns both shores across the stream, as any other riparian owner has, but none of them can exercise it without authority from the Government; and only one of them can exercise it, if you are going to accomplish anything, because, necessarily, when you give a permit to one in order to store up water to create a reservoir for running his water-power plant, necessarily he has got to overflow the land of others and take away their flow and their right. Of course he has got to pay them for their land what it is worth, but he gets the water-power privilege, and he gets it in derogation of every other riparian owner's right to some privilege who lives upon that stream and is affected by the flowage. So he is asking for something that he does not want his neighbor to get and which his neighbor can not get if he gets it. When the Government gives him that privilege it gives him the right of eminent domain to take and seize his neighbor's land and to convert it to his own use. It gives him the right to harness the river. It gives him a right to create a dangerous situation, dangerous to life and property. It gives him other rights that the ordinary citizen does not enjoy. So the right also depends somewhat upon that.

The right of the United States to legislate on this subject and to provide conditions rests upon these several things, but primarily it rests on the constitutional right under the commerce clause which gives it the right to prohibit or permit under conditions to be agreed upon. It is not a question then of justice in the matter of giving anybody a privilege of this kind. It is not a matter of just how many years you ought to let him have it. It is not a question of just how much you ought to pay him for it when he gives it back. It is a question of policy, pure and simple, how we are going to let him use this power, this right, that belongs to all of the people primarily, but which all can not enjoy personally. So we must delegate the right to some or else in order to induce other people to come in we must make it worth while for them to come in and develop these resources for us. We can do it ourselves as a Government or we can delegate it to a governmental agency.

Then the question is, What terms are you going to put into this bill? Such terms as we can agree on. Of course if these terms are made so harsh that no one will accept them, you are doing nobody an injustice except the Government itself, because you can not get anyone to do the work and it seems that public sentiment will not yet permit the Government to engage in the work.

If, on the other hand, you make terms that are compatible with the public interest and which will induce men to come in and make these improvements, everybody is happy and the water power is turned to some good use, helping the public on the one hand and pouring profit into the pockets of the others who operate it.

So, I say, it is a question of terms and not a question of confiscation of property after the 50-year limit. This talk of unfairness, this talk of equity, in my judgment, does not belong to the discussion, but it is a question pure and simple of what you will give, and how much you will take for what you will give.

Now, passing on to these terms, the angle I desire to discuss it from is the question of policy. It is a question of the policy that we are going to adopt, and that is the thing to be considered in the bill. Whatever is the best policy for the people of this country as a whole is the policy that I think we ought to adopt. I do not think a great governmental policy should be based upon a primary consideration of profit to individuals. It should be a question pure and simple of benefits bestowed upon the people at large through a national or governmental agency.

Now, as to the terms. The committee bill provides that unless revoked for cause, as provided in a certain section, these rights shall continue for a period of 50 years, and after the expiration of the term such rights shall continue until revoked, as provided in the bill.

The amendment I have proposed provides a term of 30 years, with two additional terms of 10 years each, at the option of the licensee, the two 10-year periods to be upon such terms not incompatible with the bill or repugnant to the terms of the bill, as may be prescribed by the commission.

In connection with that, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the proposition that while each measure provides that there may be a renewal after the 50-year period, under the committee bill it continues right along until certain conditions have been complied with. In other words, there is no interruption of the term at all, and they do not have to come to the United States to renew their license.

It is up to the United States to come in and interfere with or interrupt the running of their license. It is true that there are certain conditions provided in this committee bill under which the United States can recapture the property; but, as I shall try to show a little further on, those conditions are of such a nature that it does not seem reasonable, and it is scarcely possible, that the United States shall ever avail itself of a privilege which in effect is no privilege at all. As was argued by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], why put anything in a bill which purports to give a privilege but which is a privilege of which the United States may avail itself without such provisions in the bill?

In the recapture clause in this bill you provide for the payment of such a sum of money, or, rather, as a basis for the payment of money, that is exactly identical with values fixed by the courts in condemnation proceedings. If that is all there is to it, why burden this bill with such a provision? Why not let it run right along; and if the United States ever wants to get it let them go in and take it and pay just compensation under condemnation proceedings? You are adding nothing to this bill by putting in such a provision as that.

There is another distinction between a provision that continues until it is revoked and one that revokes it absolutely. What is the difference? It is a difference between being in and being out. It is the difference expressed in that old saying that possession is nine points in law. As to the corporation, if the future may be judged by the past, when it requires some affirmative action on the part of the Government to do something, and somebody has got a privilege that is continuous unless it is stopped, every effort will be made to stop the action, to prevent any interruption; and instead of their coming here and asking us or asking our successors here to give them a license, they will have the Government trying to treat with them, trying to regulate them, but unable or impotent to do so; in other words, they have what amounts to a perpetual license, subject only to the condition that the United States do something that it probably will never do.

Mr. REED. And something that it can do without the provision.

Mr. HUSTING. And something it can do without coming and asking for it in this bill.

Now, I desire to discuss the reversion clause or the recapture clause. In the reversion or recapture clause the so-called Shields bill provides that the fair value of said property shall be paid—I will read the part that I wish to call attention to:

> That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon giving the grantee—
> A certain notice—
> and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures, required by the United States, and assuming all contracts entered into by the grantee which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof, or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances existing at the time such contracts were made.

Then it goes on and provides that "the fair value of the property and reasonableness and good faith * * * shall be determined by agreement," if not by the courts.

And here is an amendment to the bill which perhaps some of the Senators have not read:

> When the permit expires by limitation, or is terminated under the provisions of this act, the United States may take over, acquire, occupy, and use all the property of the grantee herein described, and upon the terms herein provided, for such purposes as may be authorized by then existing laws; or the Secretary of War may grant a permit to any person or persons defined in sections 1 and 10 of this act, upon the same terms and with the same restrictions and preferences provided in this act, and as may be authorized or required by the existing laws, who shall take over the property of the original permittee upon the payment of its fair value in all things as the United States is authorized and required to do; or the Secretary of War may renew the permit to the original permittee upon the same terms and with the same restrictions and preferences and as may be authorized and required by then existing laws.

Mr. President, this amendment gives the United States three options: First, either to take over all the plant or any part thereof affected by this franchise and to pay a fair price for all the property that it takes. What has the United States got to take? As I understand it—and if I am wrong I should like to have some one correct me—it means all the property, not only the power sites, the dam, and the machinery for the generation of electricity, but it means the entire transmission plant wherever it may go. If we can foresee something that is going to happen, and there is a pretty good indication on that diagram as to what is going to happen in the way of interlocking directorates and the combination of these plants, it is not unreasonable to suppose that in a few years from now one concern, or at most a few, will have transmission lines running all over the State, and for that matter running all over the United States, and it is not unreasonable to presume that they will run along certain valleys in certain regions, and that the transmission lines will grow into great systems like our telephone lines and our telegraph lines. If the United States ever wants to get back or to recapture one water power, if any municipality wants to acquire one water power, or if any State wants to acquire one water power, what has it got to do? It has got to buy out the whole business; it has got to take over the entire transmission lines. Who is going to do it? Is it reasonable to suppose that the United States will do it? In other words, to get hold of the thing that of itself was only a unit, by the operation of assignment and otherwise, in the course of 50 years it becomes only one little speck in a great system of transmission lines, and so involved and tied up that you can not take the one unit without taking the whole system. I submit that that is not a fair proposition to the people; and, as I said before, we could do that without having such a provision in the bill. If we ever want to go into the transportation business or if we ever want to go into the electric-lighting business or the electric-heating business, we can do so anyway without availing ourselves of any rights given in the pending bill.

But if we want to take over a water-power plant we should be able to do so, and the proper kind of bill would give us the right to do so without compelling us to take over a whole light, power, and heating system with transmission lines annexed. So I say that the provisions of the bill concerning the taking over of the property do not mean anything; they do not add anything to our rights; they only appear to concede something which upon reflection we know we have without such alleged concession. Not only that, but you have got to assume the then existing contracts; you have got to pay them a fair value for all the property they have, and you will have to pay consequential damages for loss of profits and whatever else the courts may hold is within the definition of the term "fair value."

While I am on that subject I want to say another thing. Not only have you got to buy up all of their transmission lines, their power sites, and their dam sites, but, as pointed out by the Senator from Montana, you have got to pay them for the unearned increment. As the Senator from Montana also pointed out a little while ago the States will probably give rights of way to transmission lines across public lands without cost, and if you want to get them back 50 years from now the people of the United States will have to pay the then full value of that property which they got for nothing. In other words the people will have to pay for property which they gave to these transmission lines plus the unearned increment.

I want to say that the substitute I offer proposes that before the issuing of a license the lands shall be valued by the commission at the price paid for them, if it is a bona fide price. The commission is composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of the Interior.

The substitute provides that before receiving a license the applicant must show what he paid for the land. He must also file his plans and specifications before receiving a license. The value is fixed by the commission at that time. The applicant must also file his plans and specifications for the power plant and things of that kind, so that the commission will be fully advised of the amount of money that has been put into the investment. Then at the expiration of 50 years the license comes to an end. If the United States want to, it can take it over by paying the cost of the land as fixed by the commission, and the improvements shall be fixed at their valuation, taking into consideration their deterioration at the end of the 50-year period.

So under the amendment which I propose the so-called recapture clause means that the United States shall take that property without the unearned increment, without the raw water-power right, and shall pay for the improvements what they are worth.

The owners will be paid under their contract what they paid for their lands and what their improvements are worth; and the profits which they have enjoyed for the period of 50 years will be their recompense.

Now, there is another thing in the Shields bill I want to call your attention to. Suppose the United States does not choose—and it probably will not choose—to exercise its option; what are the alternatives? Let me read:

Or the Secretary of War may grant a permit to any person or persons defined in sections 1 and 10 of this act upon the same terms and with the same restrictions and preferences provided in this act and as may be authorized or required by the existing laws who shall take over the property of the original permittee upon the payment of its fair value in all things as the United States is authorized and required to do.

What does that mean? If we do not take it over ourselves, then the Secretary of War—

May grant a permit to any person or persons, defined in sections 1 and 10 of this act, upon the same terms and with the same restrictions.

If I understand that correctly, it means upon the same terms as in the original lease, and not upon new terms that may be then proposed. In connection with that, you will find that section 13 of the Shields bill provides:

SEC. 13. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved: Provided, That in case any grantee hereunder shall, at the time of such alteration, amendment, or repeal, have exercised rights in accordance with this act, such rights and the property used thereunder shall be deemed property rights of such grantee, of which such grantee shall not be deprived by such alteration, amendment, or repeal, except upon the conditions provided in case of termination by section 6 of this act.

I read that in connection with this proposition because, as I construe the two together, the meaning is that if we do not take the plant over ourselves, then the Secretary of War may lease it to somebody else upon the same terms as those contained in the original lease. While the words are added "and as may be authorized or required by the existing laws," the meaning is that the rights which become vested under the original contract can not be altered or repealed or amended. Therefore, as I understand it and read it, the old lease is perpetuated, so that if the United States does not take over the plant the development will have to run along on the same terms on which the original lease was granted, and the property rights of the grantee can not be interfered with.

The next alternative is that—

The Secretary of War may renew the permit to the original permittee upon the same terms and with the same restrictions and preferences as may be authorized and required by then existing laws.

That in effect merely makes conditions under which the United States will never take it over, or, if it does take it over, will give it to somebody else under the same old terms or give it to the permittee under the same old terms, but interfering with no vested right in the license. Somebody else may be allowed to come in under the original terms of the lease so far as property rights are concerned, but if the plant is taken away from the original permittee there will have to be paid all the consequential damages and all that comes within the definition and meaning of "fair compensation." So, I say that in effect a license under this bill means a perpetual license, or even in the event it is recaptured at all, it will have to be recaptured under such terms that the initial permittee will have to be not only compensated for his property, but will have to be compensated for it upon a basis of a perpetual right to use the water, and the people will eventually have to pay for such prices in the rates charged by the last licensee.

The amendment which I propose as a substitute for this bill provides that the Government may at the expiration of the lease take over the plant by paying for the land what it was valued at in the beginning, and by paying for the improvements what they are worth at the time of the taking, and if the United States does not desire to take it over, it can renew the permit to the same licensee or to a new one upon such terms and conditions as it may then think proper. So that there is a finality to this 50-year proposition; the United States is put in control, and the United States is kept in control of the property, and when it renews or issues a new license it is free from so-called equitable claims and can control on a new and free basis.

Now we come to the rental charge. There has been a great deal of discussion here to the effect that the Government has no right to charge a rental, and one of the most persistent arguments against any other kind of bill than the committee bill is that capital will not invest; that capital will not enter into these enterprises. That, if true, would be bad; but how do we know whether or not capital will go into a proposition of this kind. We can not take the word of capital for it. We can only know by observing what other countries are doing, under what terms these concessions are granted in other countries, or by considering the reasonableness of the terms we make. If all legislation is going to be defeated upon this subject merely because somebody comes in and says, "If you put those conditions in we will not develop the water power; we will not do this and we will not do that," then, of course, we might just as well quit, because some people will never fail to say that; they never have yet; and it does not make any difference what you do or what reasonable terms or conditions you put into a license of this kind, unless it is written just exactly as they dictate it they will say that capital will not come in. Now, we are not bound to believe that statement. Surely we must assume that reasonable men will accept reasonable conditions.

At the present time the United States has a monopoly of water-power control and can exercise that right. I say that it is a fair criterion as to the value of the argument to ascertain what other Governments are doing in this respect. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] went into that somewhat the other day; but I wish to go into it perhaps a little more fully than he did, and may travel over some of the same ground. Take Switzerland, for instance. Switzerland charges a compensation; Switzerland does not give her water powers away without requiring something in return.

Federal legislation will make regulations dealing with the disposal and character of water-right concessions, as well as with the transmission and delivery of electrical energy, so far as the protection of public interests and the proper development of these resources require such legislation.

Wherever Federal legislation does not regulate the terms of the water-right concessions the disposal of these concessions, as well as the fixation and collection of charges and imposts for their use, are under the jurisdiction of the Cantons. This regulation by the Cantons must not seriously embarrass the development of the water powers.

I will show what the French do in this regard. I am going to quote from these pages so that anyone who is sufficiently interested can look the matter up. I am reading from hearings before the Committee on Public Lands, 1914, on water-power bill, House bill 14893, where in an appendix the facts and figures are given.

The French charge a rental, fix a term or period, and provide for recapture.

ART. 3. Authorized power plants shall be governed by laws and regulations now in force. All authorizations are subject to cancellation, and they shall not in any case be granted for a period longer than 50 years. At the expiration of that period the grantee shall, if the authorization is not renewed, restore the premises to the condition previously existing or deliver the power plant to the nation without indemnity therefor, as the nation shall elect.

ART. 4. In the case of power plants now in existence the 50-year period fixed by the preceding article shall begin from the time of the passage of this act.

ART. 11. At the expiration of any concession for a power plant the nation shall immediately take possession of the plant and appurtenances constituting a part of the public domain, as defined in the preceding article, without liability for indemnity.

ART. 15. The rental accruing to the nation from authorized power plants or those under concession shall conform to article 44 of the law of April 8, 1898, and to regulations made or to be made in execution of that law. By such regulations shall be fixed the special conditions governing rentals applicable to plants established on the canals of the public domain.

Norway imposes similar terms, provides for the payment of a certain amount per horsepower, fixes the term of years, and provides for a recapture at the end of the period.

10. The concessions are granted for the following terms: For at least 60 years and not to exceed 80. The time is reckoned from the publication of the announcement of the concession. Where the concession has expired the waterfalls with improvements and works revert to the Government. Likewise it is agreed that the power station with all the machinery reverts to the Government. That which does not go to the State can be bought at its appraised value, or ordered to be removed within a certain time by the department.

4. By the concession there can be assessed a yearly tax of 1.25 crowns for every horsepower over 500 horsepower. Such a tax can not be collected where the power is obtained from a waterfall as described in paragraph 2. The tax has to be paid at the end of the calendar year. If it is not paid when due, that is added interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum recovered by an execution, and in case of bankruptcy it has the right of preference like taxes.

I want to say that in almost every one of these instances at the end of the period the plants revert absolutely to the Crown—to the Government. There is a certain permission given to certain officers to reimburse the owners when the plants are taken over, but it is not a vested right; it is a matter of choice on the part of the Government.

There has been a gread deal said here about it being unjust and unfair to make these men lose anything by way of prospective profits, or by depriving them of the unearned increment, or in some way imposing unjust and harsh conditions, and yet in all these countries, or in almost every one of them, it is provided that when the period is over the plant, with the exception of certain machinery, shall become the property of the Crown, the property of the Government, without compensation, or such compensation, if any, as the Government feels like paying.

These countries are laying the foundation for a real Government ownership. They make long-term leases, and their proposition is substantially like this: "We will put you in control of these concessions; we will let you operate them for 50 years, or other terms, under certain restrictions; you have got to serve the public upon such and such terms; and when you get through with it the property belongs to us." Of course that enables the concessionaires to amortize their plant, but I presume the Government takes it upon that theory, in the first place, because they have a contractual right to do so, and, secondly, because, if the sinking fund is large enough, and they are permitted to make it large enough, to pay for the replacement of the plant, when the public has once paid for it why should it pay for it over again? Why should it pay for it twice? In other words, under a limited period license there is no doubt that every licensee under this bill will amortize his plant; that he will add to the overhead expenses a sufficient amount which, placed at interest, will pay for his plant when his privilege expires, and he will take his profits on that amount over and above what the ordinary cost and running expenses of his business would be.

The courts will allow that and the States will allow it, and he will charge the public accordingly; so that at the end of 50 years he will have taken out of the public, over and above his actual running and necessary expenses, a sum sufficient to pay for the plant. After the public have paid for it, why should it not belong to the public? In the bill which we are discussing at the present time, if I dared, I would have liked to put in a provision which would have provided for that very thing, something similar to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa. There is no sense in making the public pay twice for the same thing.

While I am on that subject I want to refer to something else which the public will be paying on under this bill. They will be paying a return on the investment under the Shields bill, not only on the money put into the plant but on the value of the plant, upon the unearned increment as it goes along; so that the public will pay interest on the speculative value and will be obliged at last to pay the speculative value besides, and, in addition to that, the sinking or amortization fund that will be taken out of the public over and above ordinary running expenses.

I say that foreign Governments do these things differently than is here proposed. Is not capital just as timid over there as it is here? Is it not more timid? Is it not getting to be more timid over there? And yet no one raises the question that they are not getting all the development they want under the terms imposed by them.

Norway has taken the lead in this thing and her legislation pertains to the same thing there that it does here—navigable streams where the banks have passed into private ownership, and they insist that at the end of a certain period of time the properties shall revert and become the property of the Government upon such terms as they may see fit to make.

But there are some instances that are closer home than that. Not long ago the Senator from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD, made the statement that certain men down in his State, because of the harsh terms imposed by our Federal law, refused to develop there and went over into Canada and developed powers there. I assumed from what the Senator said that the Canadian law must be much milder there than it is in our country in order to lure American capitalists over there. I looked it up. I have some Canadian laws here. I do not know the name of the company that the Senator from Alabama claimed went over to Canada, but I presume it was one of these that I am about to refer to. But even if it is not, nevertheless the terms of its lease must have been similar if not identical.

Here is what the Ontario water-power law says. Let us see whether or not our water-power law as the Senator from Alabama says compares with the Canadian law in severity. Here is the Canadian law:

No such lease shall be granted for a longer term than 20 years, but the lessee shall have the right of renewal of such lease for two further and successive terms of 10 years each, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon or may be fixed by the minister.

Here is the expiry provision:

At the expiration or sooner determination of the lease the water-power privilege shall revert to and become the property of the Crown as fully as if no such lease had been granted, together with all dams, weirs, tunnels, races, flumes, etc.; but the lessee shall be allowed a reasonable time, to be fixed by the minister, to remove all machinery, etc., failing which removal such machinery shall become the property of the Crown: Provided, That where any such buildings or structures are of a permanent character and necessary or useful for the proper development or utilization of the water-power privilege the lieutenant governor and council may, upon a report in that behalf by the state hydroelectric-power commission, pay the lessee, by way of compensation therefor and purchase thereof, such sum or sums as he may deem proper upon the same being appropriated by the council.

The lessee is to be paid such sums as Canada may see fit to give. The amount to be paid by way of compensation is fixed by the minister and council.

I have some further instances that I should like to read, but I will only refer to one other, which is the power plant of the Ontario Power Co. It is very similar in terms to the lease of the Toronto Power Co. I presume that perhaps this is one of the companies referred to by the Senator from Alabama, who said that the people did not like the terms of our Federal law, so they went to Canada. Here are the terms of the license under which they take. This is a special grant:

The license is granted for the term of 50 years, commencing April 1, 1900. The company has the option of three renewal periods of 20 years each, bringing the total period under option to 110 years. It then has the further right to continue to operate for a further term, making in all 130 years. The company is to pay a clear yearly rental of $30,000, payable half yearly. In addition, for each electrical horsepower generated and used and sold or disposed of over 20,000 and up to 30,000, $1 per annum; over 30,000 and up to 40,000, 75 cents per annum; and over 40,000, 50 cents per annum.

So the minimum is 50 cents and the maximum $1.

Here is the Canadian Niagara Power Co. They have a similar agreement, where the maximum is $1 per horsepower and the minimum is 50 cents per horsepower. I could go on and cite a great many more similar cases, but these will serve for the purpose of illustration, and show that Canada is receiving now $1 per horsepower per annum in addition to a flat sum mentioned here of $30,000. And yet the Senator complains of our harsh law and also tells us that we will frighten capital away.

I know of one instance—I forget just which one it is, but one instance, at least—where the incorporators were nearly all American capitalists. They went right over into Canada, bound themselves by the terms laid down by the Canadian law, and were glad to get the power and pay the price. I have similar instances, but it would take me too long to read all of them. I have the laws of British Columbia and New Brunswick and other Canadian Provinces, and I have the laws of other countries, but they are all along the same line.

For example, the general Canadian land act which is in force in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Yukon, the Mackenzie country, and the Peace River district in British Columbia.

(a) The term of the license shall be 21 years, renewable for three further consecutive terms of 21 years each, at a fixed fee payable annually, and to be readjusted at the beginning of each term, as hereinunder provided.

(b) At the expiry of each term of 21 years the governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister, order and direct that the license and any lease granted in connection therewith be canceled: Provided, That the minister shall have given at lease one year's notice to the licensee of intention so to cancel.

(c) If the licensee shall refuse to pay the license fee as readjusted by the governor in council, or as fixed by the arbitrators chosen as provided in paragraph (e) hereunder, then in such case the minister may renew the license at the former fee, or the governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister, order and direct that the license and any lease issued in connection therewith be canceled.

(d) In either of the above cases, compensation shall be paid to the licensee as provided for in paragraph (e) under.

(e) On termination of the third renewal of such license, except in case of default on the part of the licensee in observance of any of the conditions thereof, or of any lease granted in connection therewith, compensation shall be paid for the works to the amount fixed by arbitration, one arbitrator to be appointed by the governor in council, the second by the licensee, and the third by the two so appointed; if the licensee fails to appoint an arbitrator within 10 days after being notified by the minister to make such appointment, or if the two arbitrators appointed by the governor in council and the licensee fail to agree upon a third abritrator within 10 days after their appointment or within such further period as may be fixed by the minister in either such cases such arbitrator or third arbitrator, as the case may be, shall be appointed by the judge of the exchequer court of Canada. In fixing the amount of compensation, only the value of the actual and tangible works and of any lands held in fee in connection therewith shall be considered, and not the value of the rights and privileges granted, or the revenues, profits, or dividends, being or likely to be derived therefrom.

* * * * * * *

(k) That a schedule of rates and prices to be charged to the public for the use of power shall first be submitted by the licensee to the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada for adjustment and approval before being put into effect, and that no rates or prices for power shall be legal or enforceable until such schedule has been so adjusted and approved, nor if they shall exceed the amount fixed by such schedule; and that such schedule shall be readjusted and approved by the board every seven years during the term of the lease and license, and all renewals thereof.

These Canadian laws provide a certain limited period; they provide for compensation, and they provide for recapture, by which the property eventually goes into the possession of the Government giving the lease.

As another instance to show what our capitalists might be willing to do, I understand that in the case of the Connecticut River bill, which was before this body a year or two ago, I think it was Stone & Webster who asked for the permit. They were willing to pay, as I understand, a certain sum of money every year, and they came here to the Congress of the United States, asking to pay the price named in that bill and get the privilege. I am sorry I have not that bill here, but the older Senators will no doubt have it in mind. It was stated upon this floor that it was killed because it established a bad precedent. A bad precedent for what? Why, a bad precedent because the United States was to be paid some money for a rare and valuable privilege granted them. Because somebody had to pay part of the expense of running this Government for a valuable concession that was being made, it was considered a bad precedent, and the bill was defeated here upon this floor. I mention it only for the purpose of showing that the capitalists are ready to come in and pay the price. They only want to be given permission to do so.

That does not bear out the "timid capital" argument. It proves to my mind that it is not capital that is timid in this matter. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States is timid and afraid to make some of the men who receive these valuable privileges pay something into the United States Treasury to help run the Government.

In Canada they have used the moneys that they have been getting out of these concessions for public improvements and have built the fine roads through Victoria Park. In a visit there I was informed—and while it was only hearsay, yet I do not doubt the truth of it—that out of the moneys and rentals that Canada is getting from its water powers near the Falls it has beautified that park and made the roads and all the improvements in that park.

It is not a sordid proposition to demand a money consideration in payment for a valuable franchise. It costs money to run a government, and somebody has got to pay it. Nobody donates anything, and hence we must ask our citizens to contribute their just share. It is inevitable that if we do not get it in one way we must raise it in another way. Indeed, we have got to go to every man every year by way of a tariff tax, in fact every day, and tell him: "We have got to separate you from a part of your money to help run the Government." We have to go to the man with a little house and lot, and you hold him up, and he has to pay so much money a year—in the States, at least—for having a house. You go to the farmer, you go to the merchant, and you make him pay every year so much to help run the Government. Now, every dollar that you get from a concession of this kind would go to lower that man's taxes; it would go to lower somebody's taxes, because you have to raise the money in some way, and if you do not get it in that way you will have to get it in some other way.

Now, what is wrong about requiring a money payment in return for a license if the United States wants to create waterways, wants to go into this immense project that I spoke of at the beginning of my argument here? They could provide for a payment in the case of lost water-power development, and it would go to defray the cost of such improvement, and I believe, in the end, in that way you could raise enough money so that you would not have to call upon the Congress of the United States for an appropriation, but I believe that the thing would pay for itself, if properly handled. The United States, in promoting irrigation and in promoting navigation and in the building of reservoirs, would not only prevent floods but by making proper contracts with the users of these resources we could exact enough profit out of the water power that would be developed on these streams to pay in a short time for the entire cost of the system.

Why not do that? Why not start such a fund? I have got it here in this substitute amendment. It provides for the payment of not less than 10 cents a horsepower; it is a nominal sum now, but at the end of 30 years it may be raised. Why not start in on a scheme by which the thing will pay for itself out of itself? If we ever want to create a waterway system here, I say that by the establishment of reservoirs and by building dams or permitting others to build dams across the streams for irrigation and water-power purposes, and exacting a charge for them, we will be able to get enough money out of it to pay for those improvements without its being necessary for the Congress of the United States to make an appropriation; and not only that but the very money that is put in will increase the value of the water powers themselves to the licensees, it will help the irrigation, and will stop the floods. I think that is justification, if any were needed, enough for imposing a license fee or charge, under the committee bill, if passed; and if it is not imposed now, it never will be, because these companies will be getting the power out of our control and getting it away from us, so that we can never get it back again.

As long as the United States keeps this matter within its control it will be in a position to use this great power for the benefit of the people. Why not keep the control? I have seen farmers in my community come into the office and want to distribute their property to their children during their lifetime in trust so that the children would take care of them. I have seen some of them, against my own advice, do it, and I have seen them find that in their old age they had deprived themselves of everything that was worth anything to anybody; they lost the support as well as the affection of their children and went to the poorhouse; and I say the Government can make the same mistake. It can deprive itself of everything of value that it has to give, so that its favored citizens, having no further funds to furnish will lose their respect and the love for a country that has so little sense in taking care of itself. From every point of view, with due regard to all of its citizens' rights, in justice to all of our people, this country should not permit this last resource to get out of its hands; and it ought to keep in its hands the right to tax, the right to charge, and all these other rights that are vital and necessary for a complete and adequate control of this great power and its business.

There is another thing I desire to point out here, and that is section 10. If anything more were necessary to convince anyone that this bill ought to be defeated, I should say that this alone is enough. I invite the attention of Senators to this provision.

Section 10 says:

> The Secretary of War may lease to any applicant having the capacity of grantee as herein defined, and having complied with the laws of the State in which a dam is constructed or to be constructed by the United States, the right to utilize the surplus water power over and above that required for navigation at any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed, either with or without contribution by the applicant, and owned by the United States, and on such terms as may be deemed by the Secretary of War for the best interests of the United States, and reasonable and fair to both parties, and in awarding such lease preference shall be given to a municipal corporation, a political subdivision of a State or a public-service agent of a State, or any part thereof.

A public-service agent is put on the same plane with States and municipalities all the way through this bill.

The section continues—

> Provided the plans of the same are deemed by the Secretary of War to be adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region; and in contests between other applicants the Secretary of War shall likewise give preference to the applicant whose plans he finds and determines are best adapted to develop, conserve, and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources to be affected.

In the first place, they struck that provision out of the other parts of the bill, but they leave it in the bill in so far as it pertains to water powers owned by the United States. In other words, they are going to be more liberal with the applicant who wants to get the possession of the power of the United States than they would be in cases where there is private ownership of the shores. But here is an amendment which has been put onto this bill which, in my opinion, absolutely takes it out of our own hands and makes it just as impossible to get it back again as where the property is owned and developed by the licensee himself. This is the amendment:

> The provisions of sections 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, and 13 of this act shall, in so far as applicable in each case, apply to structures erected, maintained, or operated under and in pursuance of the provisions of this section.

That amendment, in effect and in terms, makes this whole law apply to power already owned by the United States, property built up by the United States, dams maintained and owned by the United States, as in other cases, and omits only two sections from that proviso—that is, the section in which it appears, and section 2, which provides for the building of dams, which, of course, is not necessary in this, because this applies to dams that are already built. Aside from that, all of this bill applies to dams and power owned and paid for by the United States.

What is it proposed to do? It is proposed that the United States shall go and build a dam and create a water power and then shall turn it over to a permittee, so that this permittee can take it over and hook it up with his own business as a transmittee of power, and at the end of 50 years we can not get our property back without buying all of his with it and paying him the same price for the property as though he were not using our property. If he owns the land and he builds the dam, in order to get his dam we have got to take all of his property with it. But when we build our dam and let him use this dam, and he hooks it up with his property, in order to get our property back we have got to do the same thing. We have got to take all of his property with it.

It simply means that we have got to go in there and spend the money of the United States for the improvement of navigation, and then we have got to make somebody a present of that property without any consideration at all; because it is no consideration, as I pointed out before, in my judgment, if it only permits a recapture under conditions we are already subject to under general condemnation proceedings.

There is another thing. You may think, perhaps, that the thing is impossible, but I might relate a little thing that happened in Wisconsin a great many years ago, which, aside from this proposed bill, is the worst bargain that I ever heard that Uncle Sam made.

About 1852, or something like that, the United States turned over the Fox River into the hands of the State of Wisconsin, and gave it either 400,000 acres or 4,000,000 acres—I forget which. It was not any less than 400 000 acres, according to my recollection. The United States turned over the water-power rights in the Fox River of Wisconsin, which is one of the largest streams in that State, and provided that it should improve navigation and should erect and maintain locks, in consideration of which it should have this grant of land and should have all the water-power rights. The State of Wisconsin went in there and started to build some dams, but for some reason or other got tired of the bargain. Then the legislature gave birth to a corporation by the name of the Fox & Wisconsin River Improvement Co., to which they turned over the 400,000 acres of land and the improvements for what they cost and took back a mortgage for that amount.

In a comparatively short time the Fox & Wisconsin River Improvement Co. confessed its inability to carry out the proposed works, and the State had to foreclose its mortgage. It foreclosed the mortgage and sold it to three men well known in public life at that time—men from the East—and these three men, with others, incorporated the Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co., and took over the 400,000 acres of land, took over the improvements, and paid a certain amount—I do not know just how much they paid, but a couple of hundred thousand dollars of something like that—assuming all the things that the State had to assume. Then, after they had done that, they came to Congress, and Congress passed an act which provided, in effect, that the United States might take over all of the improvements providing it paid the company for them. I am informed that in the meantime the 400,000 acres were parceled out among the stockholders of the company. Most of what I am relating can be found in the reports of the United States Supreme Court, perhaps in a little different terms, but in effect what I have said. Then Congress passed an act, as I say, by which the United States took over all of the improvements, which, of course, included the locks and dams and all these things that were necessary for the improvement of navigation, and all that the grantees reserved were the water-power rights! So to-day in Wisconsin the Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. draws all the income from the water-power rights. They have just got the intangible water-power revenues or rights. They get the revenues out of it, and the improvements belong to the United States; and the United States to-day is paying for the upkeep of that dam, paying the lockkeepers, paying for the locks, and everything else.

That, in short, is the history of what has been done in Wisconsin in at least one instance. So it is not a violent assumption to assume that others will do that if they get a chance; and I do not see but that they get the chance right here to do substantially the same thing; not only that, but there seems to me to be a standing invitation to come in and help themselves.

Of course the United States may make a charge to suit; the United States Government may make a charge, but—

> The charges and rents arising from such lease or leases are hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended for maintenance of said dams and the further improvement of waterways in which the same may be situated, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

So here we go in and spend a million or two millions of dollars for a dam. Under this bill we may charge rents and tolls, but these rents and tolls shall pay for the upkeep of our dam. What do they have to do except to draw the revenues from it under that act—to take the income and let the United States continue, as they are doing in the Fox River Valley, to pay for the improvement, pay for the lock keepers, pay for the dredging, and pay for everything else?

Is that a just bargain? Where do we come in?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. The effect of that section and that law, as I understand it, simply is that the charge that is made there must be used for the purpose of keeping up the property that the grantee uses.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, he pays a rental, but it is only for the purpose of keeping in repair the property of which he is getting the benefit.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; the property that he is using—the property of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HUSTING. In other words, the United States Government builds a dam for a million or two million dollars, or whatever it may cost. Some man comes in and wants a permit to use the water power created by that dam. Without any compensation whatever, except agreeing in effect to keep that dam in repair, he steps in there and gets this valuable concession.

Mr. NORRIS. The effect of it really is that he gets the dam for nothing, but for the use of it he keeps it in repair.

Mr. HUSTING. That is the effect of it. Not only that, but he gets a vested right in that dam, because at the end of 50 years, when he has this hooked up with his transmission lines and other dams that he owns, we can not pry it loose without taking over the whole business, the whole transmission lines, the whole works. He merges it into his property, and it becomes connected up so that the United States can not get its own property back from him without paying him for all these elements of value.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I was going to suggest. At the end of the period the United States can not even get back its own property, that it built with its own money, without taking over his property.

Mr. HUSTING. That is my understanding. There is another thing on page 17 of the reprint, that preference shall be given——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I really have not been a particularly pronounced champion of the bill, but in the absence of the Senator from Tennessee I do not like to have the comments now made pass as accepted at all by the Senate. I hope that no mistaken impression will arise about this matter. The section to which the Senator is addressing his remarks is section 10, and the concluding portion thereof reads as follows:

> The charges and rents arising from such lease or leases are hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended for the maintenance of said dams and the further improvement of waterways in which the same may be situated under the direction of the Secretary of War.

So the charges are by no means restricted to, nor are they applied exclusively to, the repair of the dams.

Furthermore, I should like to say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if there is any such provision that provision relates to a dam that is constructed exclusively by the United States, and they lease it to one who desires to operate it, and the Government gets it back on such terms as are prescribed in the lease. The provisions of section 6 have nothing at all to do with a plant such as is contemplated in section 10.

Mr. HUSTING. In the first place let me say that I am glad the Senator corrected me on that point. I meant to say for this improvement. Now, it is not only for the Government dam, but it includes also a further improvement of waterways in which the same, this dam, may be situated; in other words, for the benefit of that particular dam or other dams situated on the same stream. The United States might, I insist, go to this extent——

Mr. WALSH. That is not the language. It is not the dam of which I was speaking, but the waterways or the improvement of the waterways.

Mr. HUSTING. The improvement of the waterways in which the same—that is, the said dam—may be situated.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, from a dam in the Mississippi River the money derived can be used in building levees down at New Orleans; it can be used for dredging purposes; it can be used in any way.

Mr. HUSTING. Well, whatever it may be used for, I merely wish to say that the argument will be made, and it will be made with force, that the money that is taken from the operator of any dam must be used in such a manner in the improvement of waterways as will improve his water power. In effect, it simply means that he is to get the use of the dam for little or nothing, and the little he pays shall go to the upkeep of the dam and for the improvement of his water power.

I further say, in reply to the statement of the Senator that section 6 has nothing to do with this, that I will refer him to the amendment I have just read:

> The provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, and 13 of this act shall, in so far as applicable in each case, apply to structures erected, maintained, or operated under and in pursuance of the provisions of this section.

Mr. WALSH. Where is that?

Mr. HUSTING. It is in the reprint on page 15.

Mr. WALSH. Has such a provision as that been incorporated in the bill?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. That is an amendment which was adopted since the bill was under consideration, an amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. What does the Senator say?

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is an amendment to the original bill put in by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. And it has been adopted?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I thought I had been paying a good deal of attention to the bill and I confess that it escaped my notice.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not mean that it was offered by anyone outside of the committee. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if I am mistaken. I should like to be corrected if I am.

Mr. HUSTING. I take this exactly from the original bill on file, but it is in the reprint.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the line on page 17?

Mr. HUSTING. From line 22, on page 17, to line 2, on page 18, inclusive. It is in the reprinted bill. Perhaps the Senator has not the reprint. It is there, and it says that it shall "apply to structures erected, maintained, or operated." It means simply that if you want to lease you have got to comply with section 6, and the measure of damages paid there must be paid back. I mean the same measure of damages applies to taking over on the cancellation of that lease as applies to any lease or license for a dam built by the parties, and let me again point out to you that all the other clauses of this bill applies to dams of the kind where applicable.

I want to point out another thing in that same section:

and in awarding such lease preference shall be given to a municipal corporation, a political subdivision of a State or a public-service agent of a State, or any part thereof, provided the plans of the same are deemed by the Secretary of War to be adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region.

Those words were stricken out of one part of the bill, but they are left in here in relation to dams owned by the United States. The "water resources of the region." Of course, it contains the words "municipal and State," but public-service corporations are put on the same plane with them and are affected by the same provisions. What is to prevent under this clause, or even under the general clause in the bill, anyone from taking advantage of the situation in this country, a situation which is already marked, as the diagram on the wall shows. It shows the alacrity with which this coming together and joining together is going on, and there is a reason for it.

It is true that to a certain extent that tacking of powers one on the other is a good thing. It tends to increase the total output, and it has its advantages; but the question is, Do you want to permit this thing to go on and let the only thing you have to prevent it slip out of your hands? Under the substitute proposed every unit is seizable, if you want to seize it and take it out of that clause.

As I said before, all the Government will have to pay back for it at the end of 50 years under my proposition is enough money to keep those people whole and harmless of any damages or cost and give them the value of these properties. I mean we give them the full value of the property, so that they are nothing out on their investment, and although they get nothing allowed for deterioration, they have had the use of this property. My amendment does not require the United States to reserve all of its transmission lines, but it makes and keeps it a severable unit; it cuts the unit off at the transmission lines. Senators have said that is unfair, it is unjust; that the transmission line is standing high and dry. Why? They say because their premises would be worthless; they would be cut off from their power.

I would sooner trust the United States to furnish power to light my State or business house than those who are liable to get hold of a franchise of this kind and subject us to their tender mercies. If the United States ever becomes possessed of the developed water powers, if it is ever going to build your dams, it will put them to use. Uncle Sam does not intend merely to use one of these developments for a watch charm. He is going to use it for the benefit of the people, and the prices he will give to the public will be such that no one can complain of the service any more than we complain about the cost of carrying our letters and parcels.

The United States does not desire, nor does anyone desire, that the United States shall merely take the power away in order to deprive somebody of the property. If it takes it over—and it does not need to take it over if it does not want to—but if it does take it over, it will take it over for the good of the people.

It does seem to me that in the discussion of this question there is a tendency to hold up the United States as an ogre, as a bad man, as a bogy man, who will exercise its power against the good of the people. That is begging the question on the part of those who object to interference with State powers by the United States, as though the United States wants to do something to injure a State or one of these municipalities. Do we fear ourselves? Our people trust their lives, their welfare, and everything to the Congress of the United States, which legislates for the United States. They are intrusting everything in the Government every day. If it is such an ogre, why not abolish the United States and turn it into the hands of those who want to run our business for us? I say there is no justice, and I do not think there is much logic, in that argument.

Now, getting back to the question of these combinations in the substitute that has been proposed here and which we are now discussing, the United States can step in at any time at the end of 50 years and seize one of the units, by paying, as I said, fair and just compensation, in the sense that whatever the unearned increment is shall inure to the benefit of the people. There are no raw water-power rights or anything of that kind that constitute a stop or check on this system of centralization. So while they might be able to get hold of it at some time, I mean that they might gradually get it, we have in our hands that which absolutely prevents a perpetual saddling on us of great powers like the hydroelectric powers, which if not checked in the law will be concentrated in a few hands.

Under the bill, both as to Government dams and dams built by private parties, there is one tendency, and that only, and it seems to me to be inevitable that in a short time, as quickly as the conditions will permit, there will be a consolidation of the great transmission lines of the country, so that another great institution will sit astride the necks of the people of the United States like the Old Man of the Sea, and we can not shake him off.

Now, another thing; under the original bill as printed on page 3 of the old bill it is provided:

No transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, shall be made by any grantee without the approval of the Secretary of War.

The words "Secretary of War" are stricken out by amendment.

There was some check on it, and now that is stricken out there is absolutely no restriction on the right of an assignment, as will appear in the reprint on page 3, line 11. After the word "granted," the assignments are left without any check, without any control, and there is absolutely nothing to prevent one company from getting every franchise that is obtained in the United States. Under the amendment that I propose no assignment shall be valid unless it is first submitted to and approved by the commission, which I propose.

SEC. 18. (a) That no transfer or assignment of any license granted under this act shall be valid or of any effect whatsoever unless the same shall have been submitted in writing to and approved in writing by the commission. No license granted hereunder shall be transferred or assigned to anyone except a qualified licensee under this act; nor shall any license granted hereunder to a State or municipality be assigned or transferred to any person, firm, or corporation otherwise than as security for a loan made in good faith and concurrently with and as consideration for such transfer or assignment; nor shall any person, firm, or corporation have power to acquire title to a license granted to or acquired by a State or municipality otherwise than in the enforcement of such security; and in no case shall any such person, firm, or corporation hold title to or operate for a period longer than three years any license so acquired.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator fully——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator fully that no transfer ought to be made without the consent of the Secretary of War or such governing body as may have control of it, but I think the Senator misapprehended the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War," on page 3. Unless the Senator reads it in connection with the balance of that section it is very misleading. Prior to that there were certain qualifications made in that section; that is, that a permittee must have certain qualifications. It is at the bottom of page 2. Then it is said in the bill as it was originally drawn, commencing at line 4, page 3, at the end of the line:

And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, shall be made by any grantee, without the approval of the Secretary of War, to any transferee not having the qualifications herein specified for a grantee hereunder.

I think the Senator will agree with me that the approval of the Secretary of War ought to have been stricken out. It was stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Montana and supported by——

Mr. HUSTING. As the section now stands, and that is the main point in the matter——

Mr. NORRIS. It was that way before, I will say to the Senator, but with those words the grantee or the permittee, whatever you call him, would have the right to transfer to some one who did not have the qualifications provided to become a grantee if he would get the consent of the Secretary of War to it. Does the Senator see that point? I remember when it was under consideration——

Mr. HUSTING. I understand the Senator that by reason of putting in the word "individual" it left nothing to be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I quite understand the Senator, but as it was originally drawn, with those words there, the Secretary of War had no authority to make a grant to a person or corporation not having the qualifications mentioned at the bottom of page 2, but if that grantee could get the consent of the Secretary of War he could transfer his rights to somebody who did not possess those qualifications. That is the reason why the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War" were stricken out.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator I have read a different meaning to it, that no grant was made without his approval, but the point is this, as the Senator knows: Under this bill is there any check on the assignment of a license or franchise? That is the main point.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the Senator's argument that the transfer ought not to be made without the consent of the Secretary of War, but when those words were stricken out in the particular place where they were used it was thought that they would permit a man or a corporation to get a license from the Secretary of War, and they would have to have certain qualifications, and if the Secretary of War consented they could transfer to some one who did not have the qualifications.

Mr. HUSTING. This may be assigned to anybody, whether he has the qualifications or not? Is that the idea?

Mr. NORRIS. No; with those words left in the assignment could have been made regardless of the qualifications, if the Secretary of War would consent.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to ask the Senator whether by striking that out there is anything to prevent any assignment to anybody, whether an individual or not?

Mr. NORRIS. Those words did not hinder it. If the Senator will just read it, he will see that they apply only to an assignment to somebody who did not have the qualifications of a grantee and that could be made if left in without the assignee having those qualifications.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand, but now that the words have been stricken out the check is no longer there.

Mr. NORRIS. It was not a check.

Mr. HUSTING. As I understand it, perhaps I am wrong and perhaps the Senator is right.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I see what the Senator means. I think his point is a good one. There was a provision in the bill that no assignment could be made applying to anything without the consent of the Secretary of War. The assignment we are talking about here in this particular clause of the bill refered only to an assignment to be made to somebody who did not have the qualifications to become an original grantee under the law. Does not the Senator see?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, by striking that out it made it stronger, I think, and better, and it had the effect of providing that no grantee should have a right to transfer to anyone who did not have the qualifications.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be well, I think for a provision to be inserted in the bill that no transfer should be made without that consent.

Mr. HUSTING. I only saw these amendments late in the afternoon, and I must say I have misunderstood the purport of this one. But, going to the point, there is nothing in the bill I know of that prevents or prohibits or regulates or controls the assignment of licenses to any other corporation, except so far as it applies to the qualifications to take any license.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is right in that respect.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that section 12 has some bearing upon that subject.

Mr. HUSTING. Well, that may have some bearing and it may not. Section 12 is what is known as the antitrust clause. But that does not prevent these combinations unless they shall be in restraint of trade. Besides that, that clause has been of very little real value or benefit, although I believe something of that kind appears in our statutes. Besides, if it means what it ought to mean it is inconsistent with the privilege of tying up, without any check whatever, the water-power privileges in the country, if those directly engaged in it see fit to do so, directly or indirectly.

In the first place, they may come and apply for an original franchise, or anyone else may apply for them. An individual may apply for them, and they may apply for it for the purpose of some private business, and they may the next day assign it over to a company. It is not only entirely possible, but I want at least to express it that in my judgment, if it is passed, it will result in a few years in a tying up of all the powers with a few or one great transmission hydroelectric institution. I want to repeat that this is all the more important because there is every tendency that way. I have the statistics here as given out by the department showing that already they have gravitated into certain hands, and everyone believes that what now is going on will continue unless checked as suggested.

In the report which was filed here lately on electric power development in the United States the Department of Agriculture there gave on pages 58 and 59 the figures showing how these powers are getting into a few hands. It shows here on page 58 that—

> At the end of the summary tables is given a list of the 87 corporations each of which, according to the data given in the detailed sheets, controls not less than 30,000 horsepower of primary power. Two companies contained in the list, the International Paper Co. and the Union Carbide Co., are engaged in manufacturing. The remaining 85 are public-service corporations. These 87 corporations control 3,521,423 water horsepower and 6,275,092 steam and gas horsepower, a total of 9,796,515 horsepower, or 65.9 per cent of the total listed for the United States. If the two manufacturing concerns are eliminated and the amount of manufacturing power contained in the tables is subtracted from the total, the 85 concerns remaining control 68.6 per cent of the total public-service power in the United States. Thirty-five of the 85 control one-half of this total; 16 control one-third and 10 control one-fourth. Of the 85 corporations shown in the table 59 have water-power developments and control 65.9 per cent of the total water power listed. If the two manufacturing concerns are eliminated from this number and the water power used in manufacturing is subtracted from the total water power, the remaining 57 concerns control 72.3 per cent of the total water power in the United States used in public-service operations.

And of these, 18 are named, as follows:

1. Stone & Webster.
2. Montana Power Co.
3. Utah Securities Corporation.
4. E. W. Clark & Co. Management Corporation.
5. Southern Power Co.
6. Hydraulic Co. of Niagara Falls.
7. Pacific Gas & Electric Co.
8. Pennsylvania Water & Power Co.
9. Pacific Light & Power Corporation.
10. H. M. Byllesby & Co.
11. The Niagara Falls Power Co.
12. Washington Water Power Co.
13. Georgia Railway, Light & Power Co.
14. New England Power Co. of Maine.
15. Western Power Co.
16. Alabama Traction, Light & Power Co.
17. Commonwealth Power, Railway & Light Co.
18. United Railways Investment Co.

> These 18 together control 2,356,521 water horsepower, more than one-half (51.1 per cent) of the total water power used in public-service operations in the United States. Of the 18 corporations named, the first 9 control more than one-third (33.7 per cent) of the total and the first 6 more than one-fourth (25.3 per cent).
> Stone & Webster, through their management of operating companies, control more water power and more total power than any other corporation, having under their direct management 340,211 water horsepower and 529,854 total horsepower.
> Twenty-nine of the 87 companies listed control operating plants in more than one State. Three of these—H. M. Byllesby & Co., the Doherty Operating Co., and Stone & Webster—operate in 17, 14, and 13 States, respectively. The Middle West Utilities Co. has the largest number of stations under its control—118 in 9 different States.
> Attention is again called to the fact that the character of control which has been discussed with reference to the several States is definite and complete. It consists either in actual ownership of properties, in majority stock ownership, in lease, or in direct management. The relation between the various operating companies and the controlling or holding companies is best shown upon the organization charts, presented in part 2 of this report. The figures of amounts of power controlled as given upon these charts do not agree in all respects with the data given in the preceding pages. The detailed figures for the several States had not been completed when the organization charts were prepared and it was necessary to secure such information as could be obtained from corporation manuals without the opportunity of checking the information so secured against detailed data. Wherever discrepancies are found the data contained in the preceding pages should be given preference.

Now, those 18 concerns control 51 per cent of the total water power used in public-service corporations in the United States under these difficult laws, under these laws that the friends of this bill claim have been so harsh that no one wants to begin any work, that everyone is afraid to go into it. Also under our antitrust laws, by the way, the 18 concerns now have over 51 per cent of the total water power used in operation in the public-service corporations.

It is to be made still more easy now, and there is to be no check either on the number of horsepower or on the number of developments that any one concern may have, but the bill is framed so as to facilitate in every way, shape, and manner the consolidation of hydroelectric power in the United States.

I submit that that is a very unwise thing to do, if we want to remain our own masters. The United States has the choice of ways. It can so harness its horsepower—from thirty to sixty million horsepower—that may be developed in the United States and place it under such management and control that it will be a great industrial and economic benefit to the United States, or it can, if it chooses, do the other thing, turn these forces out to run wild, to run their own way, and give just so little good as it chooses and do just so much damage as it may be pleased to do in the premises.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I copied from Harper's Weekly of March 4 some of that which the Senator has just read. But, further than that, I find that together the 18 companies control 29 per cent and over. It goes on to say:

These companies control 2,356,521 water horsepower—51.1 per cent. The first six control more than one-fourth, the first nine more than one-third. This control is definite and complete.

Says the report:

A study of the interrelation of the various public-utility electric corporations with each other through common directors or principals leads one into an almost endless maze.

Then it goes on to say further:

It is claimed that the Stone and Webster Association and concerns with which it is connected control 29.4 per cent of the water horsepower of the United States. As to the undeveloped power, 120 companies claim to own or control unused nearly 4,000,000 horsepower.

The cost of construction by private companies per horsepower cost $301 per horsepower, whereas in municipal installation it costs only on an average $138—

Nearly three times as much.

If the argument is sound that has been pressed forward by the friends of this bill, that we must not add to the cost; that the cost is immediately reflected to the consumer; then, I would ask why, in heaven's name, they stand for a proposition that costs, as a rule, $301 per horsepower, and by Government ownership or by municipal ownership it will cost $138.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, what the Senator from New Jersey has read is entirely in line with all the information upon that subject. In fact, from what I understood from the Senator from Tennessee, it is contended that it is desirable that this shall be done; that there shall be large combinations and great concentrations of this energy; and that this shall be encouraged rather than discouraged. We have had in this country an experience such as I would think would be valuable to us now in considering this question; and while a plausible argument can always be made in favor of the great concentration of business and of capital, yet we have invariably learned and found out that when we permit institutions to become so large and so powerful that we can no longer regulate or control them, then they are not a source of good to the country, but are a source of positive menace and danger to us.

Sometimes people have been mistaken. We have been mistaken in not properly conserving our national resources in the past. We will say we have acted mistakenly in not conserving a number of things that we might well have conserved, as we are trying to conserve the water power of this country now, but we too late found our mistake; but here now, with our eyes open, in the light of our experience, we should not permit a law to be passed which will eventuate in a consolidation of these powers, and which, unless we have it within our immediate control to prevent harm from being done, may grow so great and so strong as to constitute a great menace rather than a blessing; that may become a bond master instead of a good and faithful servant.

Mr. President, there are a number of other items in respect to this bill which I should like to have discussed, but I have taken so much time that I do not feel like trespassing further on the Senate for a much greater length of time.

One of the main arguments made by the friends of this bill is the argument that if these rates are regulated we should not care about anything else. I want to say that it is more important to control the thing itself than to control its rates. But I want to call the attention of Senators to two propositions, so that they may understand the difference between one kind of regulation and another kind of regulation. In the committee bill there is nothing to determine the value of the plant at the time of its development. No means is provided to ascertain what the land is worth at the time or to ascertain how much money is put into the improvement; in fact, there is nothing in the bill to ascertain anything about it that amounts to anything. There is no basis fixed for rate making, except such as any public utility may make that has been organized and put into operation without governmental supervision. Men who have given their attention to the subjects—and I do not count myself one of them by any means—men who have done great work along this line, all admit that, as a basis for rate making, there must be a physical valuation of the property; that you can not prescribe reasonable rates unless you know upon what basis of valuation the returns are to be estimated.

Here is the danger of this proposition, as found in the committee bill: They may go on and take land for power sites and for dam sites on which they will develop water power; that some one may come, and probably will come, and demand an exorbitant price for a water-power site, organize his own company, and turn in this water site for what he thinks it is worth or what they think it is worth, or what they are willing to consider between themselves that it is worth. When that is done, of course, the capitalization of that company is thereby inflated. It is watered right then and there. Not only that, but in the course of 50 years land values will increase all the time, as they have heretofore increased around water-power sites all over the United States, for, I will not say inevitably, but generally speaking, when water-power developments are made towns spring up around them and the value of the land becomes greatly enhanced. There are water powers in the State in which I live where great and populous cities have grown up around them, where it would be practically impossible to buy the lands back, except by the payment of a most exorbitant sum of money.

Not only that, but if they were valued to-day under the existing laws of to-day, the value of the land, the value of the water-power right, the value as a going concern, the value of the amount of the prospective profits—all these matters that go into the question of what would be just and fair compensation would raise the price of those power sites above what they were originally worth if they had been value at the proper time, and so it may be 50 years hence.

Under this amendment, which has been proposed, such a thing could not happen, and such a thing ought not to happen under any bill, for the value given the land is from the United States; the license is what makes the thing valuable which otherwise would be of little value, or rather gives its owner the opportunity which makes it valuable. The lands being valued and the value fixed by the commission provided in the amendment which I have proposed, that valuation would be kept on record, and at the time for the taking over 50 years hence, all that would remain to be valued would be the then physical value of the improvements, in the light and positive knowledge of what their original cost was and what the cost of repair was; so that there would be no ground for dispute as to original cost of the plant.

Even almost more important than that is this: The basis for rate making in the 50 years in which this franchise is going to operate in the case of a public utility would be absolutely established and, of course, there could not be any variation from it; it would be an admitted fact before they started, instead of being left to the opinion of a commission or a jury later on. The very permit itself would be based upon that valuation, and the public would not have to pay returns on watered water-power stock. They would pay the returns on the actual investment, and under such conditions it would mean something. What is the value to the people of a power regulation if you do not care what the basis of value is? Physical valuation of the plant is the key to the control and regulation of rates. The rest is a mere matter of computation, and the fixing of the rate results from the computation.

I desire particularly to refer to the personnel of the commission proposed by my amendment. The proposition of my amendment is that the commission shall consist of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture. There has been a great deal of discussion here as to who is the proper officer to supervise this entire matter. There has been some insistence here that this important matter should not be intrusted to one department, because other departments are interested in it. I have adopted that suggestion and put it into my amendment that the commission shall consist of these three Secretaries, any two of whom will be competent to act and to pass upon all matters of importance:

I might add here that this is no new idea. I take it from the final report of the Waterways Commission, of which former Senator Burton was chairman and of which Senators GALLINGER of New Hampshire, SMITH of Michigan, SIMMONS of North Carolina, and CLARKE of Arkansas were members. They state:

An executive board: The commission has also considered the desirability of creating some executive authority, perhaps preferably an ex-officio board to consist of the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, which shall be authorized, under such conditions as Congress may impose, to grant permits for the construction of dams and appurtenant structures for power and other purposes in navigable streams and upon the public domain. Such a plan would give to Congress full opportunity to determine the general policy of such grants and make such changes from time to time as conditions might suggest, but would relieve it from the necessity of passing a special act for each grant, which to all intents is an executive function. A board so constituted would have the utmost facility for securing the most reliable engineering and other expert information necessary for an intelligent determination of the facts. Such a board would also most readily coordinate the activities of the departments having to do with the public domain, and would facilitate the promulgation of uniform rules for the use of public land.

Besides granting permits for dams in navigable streams and establishing uniform rules for the use of the public domain, such a board could most readily perform certain other administrative functions which Congress could not very conveniently or properly undertake, but for which every franchise should provide. One such provision has already been suggested, that of valuing and taking over or transferring to a third party the property of a grantee on the expiration of a grant, in case such a course were found necessary in order to protect the public interest. Such a board should also, in the first instance, be authorized to institute an examination to determine, in each case, whether a proposed development would be consistent with the utilization of the entire power possibilities of the stream as well as with the maximum beneficial use of its waters for all other purposes.

Now, I want to quote the same commission on the question of assignment:

Another important administrative necessity is that of approving or forbidding the assignment of franchises. The securing of franchises for water-power development for purely speculative purposes, where there is no bona fide intention of making the development on the part of the original grantee, is one of the most evident dangers to be guarded against. The combining of competitive plants by assignment of grants for the purpose of eliminating competition and raising rates of service is another possible abuse of the privilege granted. The evils which might result in either of the above-described cases can be prevented by making franchises transferable only with the approval and consent of some public authority. Under other circumstances the assignment of a franchise might be in the public interest and highly desirable. The commission would, therefore, recommend that it be made a condition of every grant that it is not assignable except with the consent of the proper Government authority.

While I am on that subject, I should like to quote something more from that report:

Charges and regulation: That a grant for water-power development constitutes a special privilege, for which the Government is entitled to proper compensation, is a principle which should be clearly established. The actual value of such privilege will, of course, vary greatly under different conditions. Every grant of the Government should, however, be dependent on the payment of such reasonable charges as may be determined by the circumstances and equities involved in each case. The commission does not suggest or advise that this right or power of Congress should be invoked as a means of raising revenue for general purposes, but only to reimburse the Government for the cost of surveys, inspection, and similar expenses, and for the purpose of controlling the use of streams in the interest of the public.

There would be another function for this commission to perform, namely, that of rate making.

The substitute amendment, I think, is in sound accord——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was much interested in the report the Senator was reading, as I have been in his entire speech this afternoon. The report from which he has just quoted indorses so many of the suggestions the Senator has made for the improvement of this bill in the public interest that I wish he would give us again the names of the members of that commission.

Mr. HUSTING. Senator Theodore E. Burton, Senator Jacob H. Gallinger, Senator Samuel H. Piles, Senator William Alden Smith, Senator F. M. Simmons, Senator William Lorimer, Senator James P. Clarke, and Representatives D. S. Alexander, Frederick C. Stevens, Irving P. Wanger, S. M. Sparkman, and John A. Moon.

I feel that the amendment which I have proposed is in its terms a very conservative one. When the Senators whose names I have just read propose important features such as I have indicated from their report the amendment, I think, should not be considered as in any way impracticable or visionary. I venture to say that two or three years ago the people of the United States were unanimously in favor of a measure of this kind. It was then generally conceded that the United States should take care of these resources in a proper and effective manner.

We have had some fighting about this matter in our State. I am fairly familiar with the contentions of the men who represent the water-power interests there; I am familiar with the views of members of the Wisconsin Legislature who took the attitude in regard to water-power development that friends of the committee bill did; but I venture to say that no one of these ever has proposed or submitted a bill in which the regulatory features were so conspicuous by their absence as in the committee bill. I believe that there is nothing in this committee bill to which anyone who desires to go into the business of water-power or hydroelectric development can take the slightest exception; nor does there appear to be anything omitted from it which would give him the free and unhampered control of this development. That may be all right from the point of view of the man who desires to engage in this business and from the point of view of those who believe that, at any cost to the public in the way of depriving them or waiving any rights of control that they may have, that is the proper way to get the thing moving. But I for one—and I believe I am voicing the sentiments of most of the people of this country—feel that something more than mere perfunctory regulations should be had, something more than mere rate making, such as would be within the jurisdiction of the State, any way, is needed in a bill of this kind.

There is just one more thing I want to say about the question of regulation. In the committee bill regulation is left to the States. I have a statement made by Secretary Lane in 1915 on House bill 16673, from which it appears that there are only 13 States in the United States that have provided for such regulation. The States named by him are Arizona, Wisconsin, Michigan, Missouri, New Mexico, Kansas, Oklahoma, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, California, Oregon, and Washington.

Statement of Secretary Lane:

The States of Arizona, Wisconsin, Michigan, Missouri, New Mexico, Kansas, Oklahoma, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, California, Oregon, and Washington have provided public-service commissions or bodies vested with more or less authority to regulate and control public-service corporations. The other States containing public lands and reservations do not appear to have provided for such control or regulation, nor has same been provided for the Territory of Alaska. In some of the States named as having public-service commissions it is represented that the control and supervision is entirely inadequate. Be that as it may, legislation to be enacted should provide for appropriate control and regulation, either by the States or by the Federal Government where the States do not act, where the development is of such a nature and extent as to pass beyond the jurisdiction of a single State. Water-power transmission does not stop at State lines. Power development and long-distance transmission connect widely separated localities and communities. The public interest requires that there be no hiatus. Where State control ceases or does not exist, Federal control is essential to protect the people.

If the committee bill becomes a law, I do not know of any instrumentality or commission which the other States have to see that the people of the United States and the citizens of the respective States get just rates. So that, even in that feature, it does not appear to be very broad or to be of any great amount of service. What the people of the United States must pay in rates is some part of the business of the Government, and how even in that respect under the pending bill the people can derive any benefit, except in the particular States named, by the regulation of prices by public utilities is something that I can not see or understand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The statement which the Senator has quoted from the Secretary of the Interior must have been made some time ago, because we have had a public-utility commission in the State of Colorado for the last six years at least, and the Senator did not name Colorado as one of those that had a public-utility commission.

Mr. HUSTING. I can only say to the Senator that I quoted from the statement of Secretary Lane in 1915 before the Senate committee on House bill 16673.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that the Colorado commission has just filed a report showing to what extent it has regulated the electric-light companies and also the railroad companies in the State of Colorado.

Mr. SHIELDS. When was that report made?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That report was made for the year 1915, and was filed, I think, about January 10 last. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, while I am on my feet, inasmuch as he has referred to combinations in connection with this bill, how can a company organized under the provisions of this bill obviate this clause:

SEC. 12. That the works constructed and maintained under authority of this act shall not be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, controlled, or operated by any device or in any manner so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination in the form of an unlawful trust or monopoly, or form the subject of any unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or Territories, or within any one State or Territory, in the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy.

It seems to me that when the Senator speaks of combinations that might be formed under the provisions of this bill he is not clearly holding in mind that provision which absolutely prohibits such combinations, for violation of which they are made subject to the penalty of the forfeiture of their rights, and under which, therefore, they will be under the complete control of any action that might be brought by the United States Government.

Mr. HUSTING. Let me ask the Senator is not that almost the identical provision of the present law on the statute books of the United States?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; that is not the law on the statute books.

Mr. HUSTING. We have an antitrust law, have we not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is quite aside from this provision.

Mr. HUSTING. In what respect do the two differ?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will tell the Senator how this provision came about. There was considerable contention about combinations of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska. This provision is similar to the provision which was incorporated in the bill in regard to leases of Alaska coal lands, which was made for the purpose of preventing any combinations as to coal lands. It does not apply, however, to coal lands in the United States proper; in fact, does not apply to any part of the United States; but I can not conceive how a corporation organized under the pending bill can in any way form a combination with any other company whatever. If it does so, it will be in plain violation of the law of the United States.

I will state that this very section was formulated for the prevention of combinations by what are called the conservationists, and for that reason it has been incorporated in this bill. It seems to me that ought to be a complete answer to the charge that corporations organized under this bill can combine with other corporations.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, the effect of that argument is that, according to the law, we can not have any combinations, we can not have any trusts, but the fact is that we have them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This is not the law yet; that is the trouble. We have no law on water powers or anything else that prevents combinations.

Mr. HUSTING. I am speaking now generally, if the Senator will permit me, and I say that we have antitrust laws, but we have trusts; we have anticombination laws, but we have combinations.

I want to say further that the Senator's argument is entirely at variance with the argument of the Senator from Tennessee, if I understood him correctly. The Senator from Tennessee said it was a very desirable thing to have these combinations hooked up together—to afford an easy way for a region to be developed by one concern. It is true the provision was taken out of the bill; but the argument was made, and I think the Senator supported that argument by saying that in the very nature of things it was desirable to have these combinations and these powers all tacked together for the best development of the public good. You have it so in this bill now in regard to publicly owned dams. You provide there——

Mr. SHAFROTH. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. HUSTING. Page 17.

> In awarding such lease preference shall be given to a municipal corporation, a political subdivision of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or any part thereof, provided the plans of the same are deemed by the Secretary of War to be adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region.

The antitrust laws will have to be construed with these provisions. If you open the doors and make it easy for combinations to be formed, you can not very well contend on the other hand that another clause forbids the very thing that you are attempting to promote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like at least to state to the Senator my interpretation of that provision, which seems to me to be a very wise one, because it is the object and the purpose of the Government that every possible drop of water that falls shall be utilized, and you can not utilize it if you are going to let a small concern come in and divide the water.

In other words, suppose that a municipal corporation has a town of 5,000 people to supply with electricity, and suppose the water that comes down there will furnish enough for a town of 100,0000. It is not right that that little municipal corporation shall go and file on the water, and thereby spoil the use of electricity for 95,000 people. On that account, under this bill it is attempted to cluster and make these developments as large as possible; and when it is regulated and controlled by the utility commissions of the States, the people who are interested, and who buy this electricity, are the ones that are going to be protected.

Mr. HUSTING. I will ask the Senator a question. Is he in favor of municipal ownership of utilities?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am to a certain extent; yes, sir. I voted for the Alaskan bill.

Mr. HUSTING. Then I will ask the Senator, why could not a municipality, if it were given the power, dispose—as it no doubt now has the power to dispose—of the surplus power not needed for its own use?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It could; and no doubt the Secretary of War would prefer, and it is natural that he should prefer, a municipal corporation, for instance, that would say: "We can generate a million horsepower. Our town does not need more than 100,000 horsepower"; but I have no doubt that under this preference clause he would give the right to the municipal corporation to do it. This is intended for a case where a corporation only wants to supply a town of 5,000 population or to furnish, say, 5,000 horsepower, and yet the region will supply power to the extent of ten or twenty times that amount, and it ought not to be spoiled, because it might destroy the entire possibility of the power plant for the large amount.

Mr. HUSTING. Let me ask the Senator, since he is in favor of municipal control, and the object of this bill is to give them a preference, what a municipality will do if it once permits its water-power site to get into this grouping together, and your bill provides that he can not take one without taking it all?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not understand the situation. A municipal corporation has not any less rights than an individual under this bill. That is certain.

Mr. HUSTING. No; but the point I want to ask the Senator about is, How he thinks a provision for municipal ownership of public utilities will be of any value to a municipality when the provision in the bill is such that there may be a large grouping together of power, and that the municipality can not take part of it without taking over the whole business?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The answer to that is that if the municipal corporation can use only, say, 5,000 horsepower, and can not afford to construct any more than a plant of 5,000-horsepower capacity, it would be absurd to let it do so when the same water power developed on an enlarged scale could furnish 100,000 horsepower. That is the reason. It is for the benefit of the use of the water, and inasmuch as it is controlled by a public-utility commission you would find that no citizen would be deprived of any rights.

Mr. HUSTING. I can not follow the reasoning of the Senator in saying at one moment that there is a clause here to prevent combinations, and then, on top of that argument, that it is a good thing to have combinations. I can not follow his line of reasoning.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; this is not a combination that I have been referring to. I have been referring to a large filing upon waters by one company. It is not a combination, because this bill is wholly prohibitive of combinations.

Mr. HUSTING. It is prohibitive of combinations that may, nevertheless, under the terms of this bill, find legal warrant under it. I say that in construing a bill even with an antitrust clause, when it is apparent from the wording of the bill that that is what you are after, that you want a grouping of these powers, that you want a combination of these powers, and the very object of your bill is to get a combination of these powers, you must take the two things together. It is not sufficient to say that you have a provision in there that will make impossible something that you are intending to make possible in another provision of the bill. They must be construed together.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I submit that that is not fair as to my interpretation of it, anyway.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say right here that in this antitrust clause, as suggested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE], you use these words:

> That the works constructed and maintained under authority of this act shall not be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, controlled, or operated by any device or in any manner so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination in the form of an unlawful trust or monopoly, or form the subject of any unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or Territories, or within any one State or Territory, in the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy.

You have got in this bill a provision that anybody may get a license on public lands. You even want to give the license to some one who appears to the commission to be best able to develop the resources of that region and have no restriction in the way of assignments. So it is clearly apparent that a combination under this act would be a lawful combination and not in contravention of section 1.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that the words "unlawful trust or monopoly" are the very words that are used in the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that this very clause was put in by the people who were supposed to be in favor of conservation, to prevent any kind of a combination that would be against the public interest in the Alaskan matter. That is why they are in the bill now.

Mr. HUSTING. I can only say, in reply to that, that this clause standing alone might be construed as the Senator wants it to be construed; but when it is put into a bill like this it must be construed at least together with the other provisions of the bill. I say it clearly does not contemplate that any combination under this act will be an unlawful combination. But be that as it may, what I want to reiterate is that I understand from the Senator's own argument that he thinks these combinations are desirable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I have not so stated.

Mr. HUSTING. My understanding of what the Senator said is that in discussing whether a municipality should get the power to develop a site, the Senator says it might be better developed by some one having a grouping of powers.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not a grouping, but an enlarged capital, for the purpose of having one enterprise.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; and then there may be another combination that can develop it still better than that combination.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is not a combination at all.

Mr. HUSTING. And I want to say to the Senator that there is no limit fixed in this bill, at any rate, upon the size or the amount of the power. There is no restriction on it; and it will inevitably lead, and must lead, to the final control and management of these things getting into one hand.

In conclusion, I just want to say that the substantial difference between these two bills is not so much a matter of the language in which they are clothed. The entire purpose of the two bills is different. As I said in opening, one of these bills is founded on the theory that time is of the essence of the development; that capital should be induced to come in and make these developments without any regard which combinations are the result or anything else; and the other bill is founded upon the theory that this important right should not get out of the hands of the people without the proper safeguards around it. The two bills differ in this essential respect: That in the first place in the substitute the Congress has a check on it, because every power must be authorized by Congress, and if it sees any tendency toward a combination we can check it by refusing to grant the franchise. We also provide for a 50-year clause in the contract, which stops the running of the franchise at a particular time. The committee bill, on the other hand, permits it to run on and on until the United States must do something affirmatively to stop the running of the contract.

Secondly, the amendment provides for physical valuation, cuts out the unearned increment, and provides only for the payment at the end of the 50-year period of so much as shall be required to keep the company, the license holder, free from any loss or damage. The amendment also provides that they may segregate one unit and pay for that. The committee bill, on the other hand, provides no basis for rate regulation, and provides for the payment of fair compensation, not on the basis of the value of the land at the time of obtaining the license, but at the time of taking it over. If the Government ever takes it over. Not only that, but it provides—and there is another evidence of what may be expected—that if it shall become a part of a transmission line, every part of that plant, every part of the transmission line, must be taken and paid for before you stop the running of the contract, and then, if you renew it, you must renew it on the terms of the contract. In other words, you make conditions that are impossible of fulfillment, and, in effect, give a perpetual lease.

Not only that, but your theory of valuation means nothing, because under those terms we can get the plant at any time, whether it is put in the bill or not; and if we can not get it at any time, then we can not get it under the bill. It provides further not only for payment for the property, but it provides for those consequential damages which courts allow in taking over property.

The substitute provides for a charge of not less than 10 cents a horsepower, and provides that this money shall be used in establishing reservoirs upon the headwaters of the streams, and in every way would fit in with any scheme of waterway improvement that this country ever sees fit to undertake. The committee scheme will absolutely kill and prevent a comprehensive development of our inland waterways at any time, because private vested interests will intervene and interfere and obstruct any attempt on the part of the United States to take them over.

Not only that, but in the committee bill we are surrendering governmental control of the stream because by putting it in the hands of private individuals and corporations for private purposes we are putting in their hands the control of the great waterways of the United States. Vested interests will grow up in such a way that we will have lost forever jurisdiction over the great waterways of the United States. Our substitute bill provides for a charge and for practical readjustment of controls. It provides for a real rate control and for physical valuation as a basis for that control. Those are some of the chief differences between these bills. There are others that I have gone over in the argument, to which I need not refer again at this time; but all of these essential differences between the bill and the substitute have been indorsed by men who are considered good business men and of a conservative turn of mind.

It is up to the Congress of the United States—the Senate at this particular time—to decide upon the policy and decide whether it wants to align itself with those who believe in disposing of this great resource without adequate return to the public and without proper safeguards and beyond all control or whether they believe that these things should be looked at from the viewpoint of the future and in the light of what these things may possibly mean for us 50 years from now. I repeat that we are now in a position where we have not only the power but the right to declare what shall be done with these great water powers and these great waterways. The time will come if we pass a bill such as the committee bill here when "all the king's horses and all the king's men" will not restore our rights to us over power rights again. Vested rights once interfering, intervening, and obstructing Government control or management of these waterways will forever prevent—except at the expenditure of untold billions of dollars—the putting to beneficial use of the people these things which belong to the people as a whole.

I know that the argument that is made, especially to new countries and new States, that they want development, now is a potent one. But it does seem to me as though the people of the United States at large, looking at this matter from the standpoint of all the people of the country, want it so hedged about with safeguards and want the United States so to retain its control over these things that they can be controlled by our Government; that they shall not be handled with a view merely to the business or to the profit of those who have been fortunate enough to get a license, but that they shall be handled from the standpoint of what is for the best public interest.

I do not care to inject any politics into this matter; but I do not feel that in opposing the committee bill I am committing any offense against the party to which I have the honor to belong.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think the Senator is doing God's service and the country's service.

Mr. HUSTING. I am trying to, at least. I am trying to carry out what I think the party conviction and feeling is upon this matter.

We had a plank in the last Democratic platform, at Baltimore, which pledged our party to pass a conservation measure which should be in the interest of the people, and which should prevent any "trustification" or combination of the resources of this country. We have been preaching it over the country for years, and saying that if the Democratic Party were intrusted with power we would pass conservation measures in the interest of all the people. Not only that, but we have been more specific than that. We have talked about "water-power grabbers"; we have talked about the "timberland thieves"; we have talked about the "pirates of industry"; and we have talked about all those things. Now we have an opportunity to make good on that or to make bad on it. I, for one, say that if this bill is passed as proposed by the committee, in my humble judgment it will not satisfy the people. It will be difficult—nay, impossible—to get up before any American audience and defend that bill as a proper conservation water-power measure.

For that reason I say that I feel justified, although a new Member, in expressing what I understand to be the attitude of the Democrats of the country in this respect, without being thought at all discourteous to the committee, or feeling that I am doing something inimical to the welfare of the party. I believe we should keep our platform pledges. I feel that in accordance with the traditions and the professions of the Democratic Party this matter ought to be solved and settled in such a manner that when we have to go before the people, as we soon will have to do, we can point with pride to a bill which carries out the pledges of our party.

The record of the Democratic Party in carrying out the pledges of the Baltimore platform, in my judgment, has been a splendid one. The Democratic Party will have to pass a good conservation law if it wants to keep up its good record. I simply want to say that we can not go before the public and justify a measure concerning this subject, of such vast importance, unless we can show that we have kept it within our control and within our power. I do not care so much what the charge is or what the revenue is that we are going to get out of it right away, or what taxation can be put upon it; but the vitally important provision that must be in any bill that we pass is the retention of the power to manage and control that power and to get it back at some time when we want it and need it.

If we do not do that, if we let this thing slip out of our hands, and permit it to get tied up with private interests in such a way that no one can disentangle them, it will be impossible for the United States or a State or a municipality ever to get back this resource or take it over; but we will have added one more to those forces of selfishness and greed that are launched out into the world to saddle and sit astride the necks of all mankind.

It is sometimes difficult for us to realize or appreciate, I think—at least it is for me—that these things are new things in a new country; that the problems that are coming to us are problems that have never before come to anybody in this hemisphere. I presume 75 years ago it was difficult to understand that these riches lying around us loose, as it were—our property, our heritage—were anything unusual for a people to have and enjoy. We thought, I presume, that they just happened to be there; that was all, just the same as a rich man's son in drawing his check on the bank does not concern himself much with where it came from, but simply draws on it. I say it was difficult, I think, to understand that these things were coming to us but once, and that if we ever let go of them we never could get them back again.

In other words, we were a people that started in with a new slate, wiped clean. We could have put upon that slate such laws that all these riches, all this natural wealth that seemed to have been put here as though for a favored people, would have been used and distributed in such a way that it would not have interfered in the slightest with the development of the country, but would have been distributed in such a way that all the people would have benefited by it. Then we would have had no poverty in this land, and every man would have had a competence in his own right.

We did not do that. Undoubtedly the same argument then as now was used. The same argument was used with the coal, the same argument with the pine forests, the same with the iron mines, and the same with the public lands. "Develop! Develop! Give it to somebody! Throw it away! Try to get it into action in some way!" I say it must have been that argument that swept away the coal; that swept away and cut down all our forests; that disposed of empires of land for sometimes a couple of streaks of rust, without any particular care or concern as to what became of it or where it went. But there were those who did concern themselves as to what would become of it, and they were ready, anxious, and eager, of course, to take hold of it and turn it to their own use and thus the money lords came into our patrimony. But I am not talking about them now. I am merely talking in regard to the public, from the public standpoint. As I said the other day, but I want to repeat, we could have taken those coal lands; we could have taken those oil lands, and the iron-ore lands, and the forests, and we would not have needed to obstruct progress. We would not have needed to obstruct business. We could have leased out our coal lands for less than the owners to-day are getting from them. We could have leased them out for a song, if we had wanted to, in the way of a royalty per ton. We could have done the same way with the stumpage. Then we would have encouraged instead of hindered development, because of the fair and easy terms; and from those sources the revenues could have been received, which would have built our railroads, built our highways, built our canals, built our water powers. We could have built everything from the revenue that we could have derived from it. But we did not do it. What did we do? Why, we turned lands loose. To whom? To anybody—Tom, Dick, or Harry.

And what did Tom, Dick, or Harry do with them? They turned them over to somebody else, until finally some one discovered something on them that the first men were not looking for, and instead of paying a royalty to the Treasury of the United States—or, in other words, instead of capitalizing these resources in favor of the interests of the people—they are simply paying Tom, Dick, or Harry so much a ton for coal and so much a barrel for oil and all these other things.

That may seem an old-fashioned notion; it may seem impracticable, but I can only say that my idea of practicability is the use the men have made of them who now own them and who obtained them from us. There the men are making a practical use of them, because they are not going to do and will not do what the Government that granted it to them did, and their posterity will receive their benefits from them from the heritage. It was our heritage; it belonged to the people of the United States, and if wisely administered, and if these resources had been husbanded in the proper way and in a just way, in a way the people had a right to expect and demand of us, I say these things would be operated now in an entirely different way, and we not only would get the revenues from it but we would have the power over it to control it. We could tell what they could charge for coal. We could tell what they could charge the public if they were licensed by us. We could tell how much they could charge for oil. We could tell them how much they could charge for lumber. We could tell them how much they could charge for anything they produce, and if we never received a dollar of revenue out of it, if we had kept control but had used it with a license, we would not have any trust, because no trust could exist under such control.

I am only mentioning this again, not because it has any particular relevancy to this question, but I am mentioning it because here is the very same thing over again. It is not a question now what has been done in the past, but the question is are we going to profit by the experience of the past, and are we going to commit the same stupid blunder that we have committed in the past, or are we going to pass a water-power bill here that means something, that is not merely sound but is substance? The question is what policy are we going to pursue? Are we going to go and follow the lead of our thoughtless, perhaps perfectly honest, forbears and turn these things loose?

There is another thing to be considered. It is only a few years ago since the art of power transmission, light transmission, was discovered, especially that of the transmission of power, but by the discovery of the art of the transmission of power at distant points from the place where it is generated, and as suggested by one of the Senators, with the possibility that soon this power will be transmitted wirelessly to distant points, perhaps from ocean to ocean, from lake to gulf, you have made absolutely available every water power in the United States.

The American people are not slow to understand a good thing like that. It is only a question of a few years when electricity will be running our railroads, turning the wheels of all our mills and all our factories, and it will be the kind of power that will rule absolutely in this country the industrial and economic realm of the country.

We are self-regulating, we are self-governing now. I say, if we want to abandon this, have we any right to abandon it? Could we not in passing a bill at least see to it that we retain absolute control over a power which no man now living, no matter how wise he may be, can fully comprehend or understand?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it an amendment to the bill or to the substitute?

Mr. POINDEXTER. An amendment to the original bill.

The SECRETARY. In the bill as originally printed, on page 4, line 22, after the word "preserve" insert the words "and improve," so that if amended it will read:

That such grantee shall, to the extent necessary to preserve and improve navigation facilities.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, at the point where the dams to be erected under permits granted by this act are put in the streams are generally obstructed by the waterfalls or rapids where it is possible to develop water power. It will not be sufficient, of course, in the interests of navigation merely to preserve the present status so far as navigation is concerned. So I move to insert the words "and improve" at that point. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will accept the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 7, after the word "rendered," at the end of the line, insert:

By the grantee or by any subsidiary corporation any of whose stock is owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by such grantee or by any person, corporation, or association purchasing power from such grantee for sale or distribution.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 11, after the words "right of way," insert:

And such right of passage through its dams or other structures.

So that if amended it will read:

Whenever the United States shall deem such navigation facilities necessary, the grantee shall convey to the United States, free of cost, such of its land and its right of way, and such right of passage through its dams and other structures, and permit such control of pools as may be required for such navigation facilities—

And so forth.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 9, after the word "public," insert the words "to the ultimate consumer," so that if amended it will read:

Provided, That where the said power, or any part of it, shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce, the rates, charges, and services made and rendered shall be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and adequate to the public and to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. On page 3 of the old print, line 6, after the word "by," I move to insert the words "tax sales or," so as to read:

Tax sales or trust deed or mortgage issued.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. In line 8 I move to strike out the words "by any grantee."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess not later than 6 o'clock, and that when it does recess it be until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was unable to hear the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. That the Senate take a recess not later than 6 o'clock, and when it does recess that it be until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 6, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, let Thy spirit possess our souls with all its quickening power that we may cast out the devil, our besetting sin; and when we have cast him out, swept and garnished the house, help us to repel the devil of self-complacency, self-adulation, self-aggrandizement; the devil of intolerance and bigotry in party and creed; the devil of exclusiveness, which checks the flow of magnanimity; that the better angels of our nature may do their perfect work and lead on to nobility of soul; that we may be followers of Him who said, "I am the way and the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me"; that there may be fewer surprises when the mists have rolled away. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Friday, Saturday, and Sunday were read.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, before the Journal is approved I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry in reference to the correctness of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Which Journal is it?

Mr. GARDNER. The Journal of Saturday, March 4. I find that the McLemore resolution has been laid on the table under clause 2 of Rule XIII on the ground that it was reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. As I understand it, the report was a recommendation that the resolution should lie on the table. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Is that report recommending that the resolution lie on the table a report recommending adverse action?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. GARDNER. Then, Mr. Speaker, may any Member of the House demand that this bill be transferred to the calendar?

The SPEAKER. He may.

Mr. GARDNER. Within how many days?

The SPEAKER. Three days.

Mr. GARDNER. Three legislative days?

The SPEAKER. Three days.

Mr. GARDNER. Would it mean three legislative days or would Sunday be included?

Mr. MANN. The Speaker does not have to decide that now.

The SPEAKER. It happened that Sunday was a legislative day.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand that the resolution be placed on the House Calendar in accordance with the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? It does not take any objection, the gentleman has the right to do it, and it goes on the calendar. Without objection the Journals for Friday, Saturday, and Sunday are approved.

There was no objection.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask unanimous consent to report a bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment. (H. Rept. 297.)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to report a bill for the increase of the Military Establishment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the gentleman desires that the committee should have the right to report the bill notwithstanding the bill has not been referred?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is not with the intention that it shall give it any special privileged status?

Mr. HAY. No; it will be referred, as I understand, if this request is granted, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Well, it would be referred just as though it were dropped in the basket.

Mr. HAY. Just as though it were dropped in the basket.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 20,000 copies of this bill be printed, the usual number to go to the document room and the balance to be distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that 20,000 copies of the bill be printed, the usual number to go to the document room——

Mr. HAY. And including the report.

The SPEAKER. Including the report, and the rest to go to the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the first part of the request as to the document room is imperfect. Wherever we order a certain number printed of a document the usual number is printed in addition——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 20,000 copies be printed and distributed through the folding room, together with the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that 20,000 additional copies be printed and distributed through the folding room. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman an estimate to know whether the document will come within the $500 provision?

Mr. HAY. I spoke to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] in regard to it, but I do not know whether it does or not; but I should not think it would cost $500.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, if it should not come within the $500, and there is no way to ascertain that until the bill is printed—of course we can not get an estimate——

Mr. MANN. I take it the bill is printed.

Mr. HAY. The bill is printed; yes.

Mr. BARNHART. The matter of cost has not been referred to the Committee on Printing, except that in a conversation with the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the committee, he impressed me with the idea that we ought to have 20,000 of these printed; but I gave no attention to the matter of cost. However, I think it is safe to say that unless it is an unusually large bill—and I will ask the gentleman from Virginia how many pages has the bill?

Mr. HAY. Eighty-five pages.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, the bill and the report—had we not better let this go over and investigate it?

Mr. HAY. I have no objection; but I have only to say I have a great many demands for the bill, and understand that other Members of Congress have, and I am pretty sure it would not cost $500.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, to get rid of this I propose to the gentleman from Virginia that he withdraw his request and let the matter go over a day so that it can be investigated, so we can present it intelligently to the House.

Mr. MANN. Why not make the request that 20,000 copies be printed, and if that does not exhaust the limit of $500 there shall be copies printed up to the amount of $500?

Mr. BARNHART. That is satisfactory.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. HAY. That the 20,000 copies of the bill and the report be printed, and that if it goes beyond the $500 that it still be printed.

Mr. MANN. Up to the limit of $500?

Mr. HAY. Up to the limit of $500.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that 20,000 copies of the bill be printed, unless it exceeds the $500 limit, and it shall stop at that limit. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia announces that the report is a unanimous report from his committee, a very remarkable transaction.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of whether or not our Government should warn American citizens not to travel upon armed merchantmen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of whether American citizens should be warned off British warships.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Armed merchantmen, Mr. Speaker—not British warships.

The SPEAKER. Armed merchantmen. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of armed merchantmen and the American policy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of armed merchantmen and the American policy. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Colombian treaty and the rights of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Colombian treaty and the rights of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GARD, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Francis P. McCue, H. R. 10607, Sixth-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of The Hague conference findings of 1907 on the matter of neutral rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of The Hague conference findings of 1907 on the matter of neutral rights. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of shorter labor hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of shorter labor hours. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR—AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER. This is the day for the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and the unfinished business is the Aqueduct Bridge bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 759.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 759.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 759, the Aqueduct Bridge bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, when the bill was last under consideration in the committee the committee rose, with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] entitled to the floor. It was then agreed in committee that general debate should end in one hour, the understanding with the gentleman from North Carolina being that when he and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] had consumed some time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] or I might again have the floor if we desired it; and when these gentlemen have finished, then I desire to produce certain documents in answer to suggestions made when the bill was under consideration before touching the bill and certain correspondence between the officers of the War Department and the committee. I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and his colleague [Mr. COOPER] made such a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has just stated, the agreement was that there would be one hour general debate on this bill, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] is recognized.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not the Members of the House are interested in so prosaic and utilitarian a matter as the construction of a bridge, but I would like their attention for a few moments, inasmuch as they will all be called upon to vote on this measure, which is a matter of real importance, so far as the traffic across the Potomac River between the District of Columbia and the Virginia side is concerned. I do not recall whether I said on a former occasion, or not, that my own personal views relative to the need at this particular time for legislation on this subject might very well be confined to an appropriation of sufficient amount and an authorization to the War Department to prepare plans for the construction of such a bridge as Congress might determine to construct at this place. And I say this for the reason that, in my judgment, and that judgment based upon past experience and observation, by the time the plans are prepared for the construction of this bridge it will be some time in the future and we will possibly be in a better position to know just what amount of money to appropriate than we know at present. But in consultation with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who introduced this bill and from whose committee it came and who has charge of it, with the adoption of certain amendments, to which he has agreed and to which the House has agreed, it is thought a satisfactcry solution may be reached.

There can be no question but that there is necessity for the construction of a new bridge at or near this point on the Potomac River, and I say this because the evidence coming to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the War Department and to other committees from those who have had in the past the supervision and regulation of the traffic over this bridge indicates that it is unmistakably true that the present structure is not sufficient either to carry the loads or to carry the traffic that is demanded at this place.

A few years ago, because of the unsafe condition of some of the piers of this bridge, there was an appropriation made, and three of the eight piers were replaced by the construction of new ones. These cost about $60,000 each, and of course they are now in good condition; but the five old piers, by the report of the engineers who have examined them very carefully and repeatedly, are without question deteriorating very rapidly, and there can be no question but that the bridge in its present condition is not safe for the maximum loads that have been carried over it. In fact, only recently, at the suggestion of the War Department, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have issued a regulation reducing decidedly the tonnage that can be carried at any one time over this bridge, and I believe that only one street car can cross at a time.

I do not know myself, of course, what the ultimate cost of a proper and sufficient bridge at this place may be, but I do know that the engineers of the War Department have given reports to Congress on several occasions fixing the sum at less than a million dollars; the cost in no case, I believe, to exceed $1,000,000. The committee reporting this bill fixed in it a limitation of cost at a million dollars—not to exceed that amount.

There are appropriations also made in this bill for the acquiring of certain land and rights for abutments, and an appropriation of $150,000 is carried for that purpose, and an appropriation for the maintenance of the old bridge during the time of the preparation of these plans and the construction of the new bridge.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asked that an amendment be placed in the bill so that it would be constructed in such manner as not to obstruct navigation. The chairman of the committee having charge of the bill has agreed and has inserted in a copy of the bill, and will offer as an amendment, a provision meeting these requests and views. He will also offer as an amendment a proviso to the effect that as soon as the plans and specifications are approved by the Secretary of War there shall be public notice of the specifications and competitive bids invited.

This is a matter of more than passing interest.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I understood the gentleman to say that there was $150,000 appropriated for the purpose of buying lots and easements. Is not that $300,000?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; it is $300,000 in the bill, but the gentleman will offer an amendment reducing the amount to $150,000 at the proper time in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there a moment?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I did not catch the suggestion as to the last amendment.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Competitive bids will be asked for the construction of the bridge. That was the requirement, with these amendments that I have noted, and that will be offered at the proper time; if adopted I shall raise no objection to the passage of the bill.

I do not care to detain the House longer, and I yield such time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] as he desires. Is the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] here?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am here.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] and I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, at this time, in view of certain conditions that have arisen since this matter has been under consideration and because at a later time I prefer to use my time in addressing the House on that matter, I shall not now consume the time that has been yielded to me, but I will yield it to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who, I understand, states that if he can find any time that is left here after the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from South Carolina have finished speaking, he hopes he can have some time; and therefore, knowing that he can enlighten the House better on this question than I can, I yield him all my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's gracious words and conduct on this occasion but continue what we have long known about the lovely character of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Applause.] But I would not permit his generosity to do violence to his merit or his virtue, or deprive the House and the country of the wisdom with which I know he can illumine the subject. I had no idea of intimating to the gentleman that I was coveting his time.

I have tried to state, as an answer to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that I wish to produce certain documents here. I have them here and will place them in the RECORD, unless the gentleman asks me to read them.

Briefly, to make a résumé, my attention was first called to the Aqueduct Bridge in 1910, when Maj. Hannum made a report, stating that he had made soundings and investigations, and submitting three alternative recommendations about this bridge. That was six years ago. One was to repair certain of the piers in a certain way. Another was to reinforce and restore the piers with concrete, which would cost $350,000. The third was to build an entirely new bridge, which they estimated at $950,000.

In 1911 Col. Langfitt made a similar investigation, and he calculated that the bridge would cost $975,000, on account of some expense at the approaches.

In 1912 another report was made by Col. Langfitt, or through him—I have them all here—and another one in 1913. In all of these reports the absolute necessity of something being done was emphasized. Up to 1912 the question of repairing was considered, but in 1913 the condition had become so critical that a new bridge was the only thing demanded. In all of these reports, however, it was stated that at that place sufficient soundings and investigations had been made to satisfy them about the bridge.

In 1913 Col. Langfitt wrote me a letter, which I shall put into the RECORD—which the gentleman from Wisconsin asked for—in which he repeated these recommendations. He recommended that the bridge should land on the north side of the river at Thirty-fourth Street, at a cost for concrete of $1,100,000, but if erected at the present site the estimate cost was $1,000,000; but if a steel bridge, $975,000. The next day after receiving that letter I visited him, with the subcommittee, and he repeated all this statement and went through the entire case about building that bridge and emphasized its necessity. Afterwards the subcommittee examined the proposed bridge sites, and they were unanimous in concurring with Col. Langfitt that the bridge should be built at or near the present site. We considered all the questions of the approaches and landings and the possible condemnation of property. We have had a great deal of correspondence with the War Department, but that department discussed the whole proposition of solving all future questions of bridges on the Potomac. We did not think we could wait for that. This bridge has gotten into such condition, and the local interests and demands are such, and there are such vested rights up at Georgetown, that we concluded finally, with the concurrence of the War Department itself that this bridge should be rebuilt at the present site.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asked what sort of a bridge this is to be. It is to be a bridge to cost a million dollars and no more, and the amendment that I propose to offer will provide that in making the plans it shall be borne in mind, and that certainly shall be secured, that the plans will build a million-dollar bridge. Having the reports and estimates of the department and the officers in charge for six years, we have no doubt that it can be done.

Mr. ESCH. I understand that three of the eight piers have been wholly reconstructed during the last 10 or 15 years. If the bridge is built on the present alignment, can those three piers be utilized?

Mr. ADAMSON. That has not been decided definitely, but if the bridge is built on the present alignment that will be considered, and those piers will be saved if possible.

Mr. ESCH. That would make a material reduction in the cost of the structure.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; possibly it would. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used seven minutes. That would leave eight minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennnsylvania. The criticism I offered when the bill was under consideration last week was that it made no specific provision for protecting the interests of navigation. Have the committee given that matter any thought?

Mr. ADAMSON. The committee, in compliance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, will offer the following amendment:

At the end of section 1, line 2, page 3, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the words "and so constructed as to protect the interests of navigation."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That amendment will be offered by the committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], chairman of the subcommittee preparing the District appropriation bill, stated that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] had prepared some amendments that met with his approval. Will the gentleman kindly inform the committee what is the purport of those amendments?

Mr. ADAMSON. The first amendment I will propose is the one referred to a moment ago in the colloquy with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. The second amendment is in line 19, page 3, reducing the amount from $300,000 to $150,000, because after investigation we have concluded that will be ample.

We propose, in line 23, to strike out all after the word "property" and to insert: "That the plans and specifications herein authorized shall be so drawn and prepared as to insure the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto within the limit of cost of $1,000,000, as fixed herein," and so forth.

Then, after line 3, page 4, after the word "conditions," we propose to ask that you amend by inserting the words "and for such compensation."

In line 21, page 4, we propose to strike out the words "or that may be hereafter chartered by Congress."

In line 22 we propose to strike out the word "cross" and insert the word "use."

We propose to strike out lines 23 and 24 entirely.

On page 5 we propose to strike out, in lines 2 and 3, the words: "Including the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway"; those words being unnecessary.

In line 5, page 5, we propose to strike out the words "prescribed by charter," because there may be other charges not prescribed by charter.

In line 18, page 5, we propose to strike out "$50,000," and insert "$25,000," as being amply sufficient.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to inquire why the committee were called upon to provide here authorization for having freight carried across this bridge by the railway companies utilizing it?

Mr. ADAMSON. We debated that. Some people said that was a question entirely for the Interstate Commerce Commission to decide. That is true as to the rates of freight charged by the railroad; but the bridge will be our property, and the railroad company ought to pay something for using it for freight as well as for passengers.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bridge is to be designed architecturally in keeping with the surroundings and for the beautifying of Washington. Does the gentleman think that freight should be allowed to be carried across it?

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not say that it shall, but that it may. These electric-car lines accommodate the people very much by carrying some freight; and if they carry much freight they ought to pay for the use of the bridge.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my opinion, freight should not be permitted to be carried across this passenger bridge. In cities like Detroit, where freight is permitted to be carried on the electric cars through the public streets, it presents an objectionable appearance; and it is not in keeping with the purpose of this highway that freight cars should be allowed to go across this bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not insist that they shall use it in that way, but I understand there is some light freight that it is convenient for the people of Washington as well as the people of Virginia to carry across this bridge, and perhaps we ought not to prohibit it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should think that freight should be unloaded on the other side of the bridge, and let the railway companies then utilize such means as they see fit, by electric truck or otherwise, to bring it over to the District side.

Mr. MANN. They bring freight across both the Highway Bridge and the bridge at Anacostia.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Highway Bridge is specially designed for freight purposes.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. The Highway Bridge is not specially designed for freight purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. This will be a better bridge than the Highway Bridge, in my judgment.

Mr. MANN. They will use it for bringing in milk and things of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there is anything I abhor, it is to see freight on a highway which is used principally for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. It is not proposed to bring in freight trains. I am informed that the gentleman from Georgia proposes to offer an amendment to section 5, providing that after the plans are drawn the Secretary of War shall advertise for bids, and if no bid is received which is satisfactory the Secretary of War shall proceed to construct the bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the amendment I was going to offer.

Mr. MANN. I am very much opposed to that proposition, I will say to the gentleman. I do not believe the Secretary of War ought to build this bridge by day labor.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman objects to the last part of the amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes. If the Secretary of War advertises for bids, and can not get satisfactory bids, it may properly cause some action by Congress, either increasing the limit of cost or preparing new plans.

Mr. ADAMSON. Under the well-accepted theory that in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom, I conferred with gentlemen who are interested in the subject, and this was a sort of a compromise.

Mr. MANN. I can not see that there is any compromise about it in having the Secretary of War construct a bridge if he can not get satisfactory bids.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the committee wishes to strike out that part of the amendment, it will not be objectionable to me.

Mr. MANN. I want to say that if that provision is to stay in the bill I shall do all I can to defeat it.

Mr. CARLIN. What suggestion would the gentleman from Illinois offer?

Mr. MANN. Strike out the provision that in case no acceptable bids are received the Secretary of War shall at once commence the construction. Everybody knows when you get to it that you may have to increase the limit of cost. Here is a direction to prepare plans within the limit of cost of a million dollars, but when they really prepare the plans it may require more money than that or it may require a readjustment of the plans to bring it within that amount.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman that I will omit the last part of the amendment and let the Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there was an agreement to give time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who is detained at home by illness, and also time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. RAGSDALE has waived his time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have not clearly in my mind the amendment which the gentleman from Georgia refers to. The other day I spoke about the indefinite character of the plans.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have brought the documents here and have exhibited and explained them to the committee while the gentleman was out.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The proposition now is to advertise for bids?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And for plans and specifications?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; we have sufficient plans and specifications. The trouble that arose in regard to the plans was the fact that the War Department wanted to consider this bridge and other possible bridges at the same time; they wanted to take the whole length of the river and dispose of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says that they now have sufficient plans?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have plans in four different reports that have been made of soundings and investigations, and they say they can build the bridge at Thirty-fourth Street of concrete reinforced for $1,100,000, or at the present site for $1,000,000, or of steel for $975,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the design of the bridge been submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. ADAMSON. No detailed statement; just what each item shall be——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but has there been any sketch of the bridge submitted to the committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have not had a picture of the identical bridge, but we have documents describing the bridge, and it will be either of steel, a two-span bridge, or a reinforced concrete bridge. The difficulty about these plans was that Col. Langfitt stated what he thought could be done, and the War Department, when it makes specifications, is compelled to protect its reputation by making estimates high enough to do so. What we want is to make plans and specifications inside of a million dollars at that place, because we do not want to foreclose all the length of the river and take it for granted that no other bridge will ever be built below.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman feels, as we all do, that we would not willingly permit the erection of a structure here that would in anywise detract from the beauty of the National Capital. We can combine utility with beauty. We do not want to indulge in extravagance and do not want to be negligent enough to permit the erection of a thing that by and by will constitute an eyesore.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am satisfied that a two-span steel bridge, or a concrete bridge with 250 feet span, as described by Col. Langfitt, will look a great deal better than anything else in that vicinity. The plans and specifications which we have are for the bridge at this place, but the War Department was trying to include consideration of a bridge from here to Arlington and all possible bridges. We do not want that, but we want a bridge built where it is now, a good bridge of its size, and leave open the building of a larger and better bridge down the river.

The documents referred to above are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 2, 1916.

Hon. W. C. ADAMSON, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letters of February 26 and March 2, 1916, requesting information as to whether an estimate of less than $1,000,000 for the reconstruction of the Aqueduct Bridge was submitted during the Sixty-second Congress, I have the honor to state that no special communication to any committee of Congress from this department presenting such an estimate has been found. It is thought that you may have in mind statements found in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers of 1910 and subsequent, copies of which are sent to you herewith.

It will be seen by reference to the report of 1910, page 2624, that Capt. W. T. Hannum, Corps of Engineers, estimated that a new bridge could be built for about $950,000. This estimate was repeated in the reports of 1911 and 1912, but it will be seen by reference to page 3178 of the report of 1913 that on further study by Col. W. C. Langfitt, Corps of Engineers, he thought that estimate too low. On December 1, 1913, he reported the estimated cost of rebuilding the bridge on the present site as $975,000, and on the Thirty-fourth Street site as $1,100,000, but these figures do not appear to have been communicated to Congress.

In using these estimates it should be considered that the price of steel and other bridge-building materials has increased materially since the estimates were made.

Very respectfully,
DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 4, 1913.

From: Col. W. C. Langfitt, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.
To: Hon. WILLIAM C. ADAMSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Bridge across Potomac River.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

The following estimates and suggestions are entirely informal and, necessarily, only roughly approximate.

The situation of this bridge is complicated by the existing heavy traffic over it and the necessity for interfering therewith to the minimum possible degree. The best way to do this is to build on a different site and then remove the old structure complete, including piers, etc.

Two possible sites suggest themselves: A, at Thirty-fourth Street, and B, just above the existing bridge.

A. Thirty-fourth Street site. Elevation of roadway 77 feet, or 22 feet higher than present Aqueduct Bridge. Affords easy grades and greater area for passing of floods. Approach, from either Thirty-fourth Street or M Street, the former to be graded, perhaps widened, and all necessary property on south side of M Street to be purchased, to give a wide, easy approach from either direction. The axis of the bridge is more nearly at right angles to undercurrent than at present site or above it.

The style of bridge suggested is concrete (reinforced) arches of 250 feet span; width of roadway, 60 feet, with two 10-foot sidewalks, or 80 feet altogether. Estimated cost, $1,100,000.

B. Site just above existing bridge. Elevation of roadway, 55 feet, as in existing bridge. The axis of the bridge to strike existing Government land at Virginia end and existing roadway is necessarily oblique to current, giving skew arches. The only approach is over M Street in front of car barns, and the conditions for making a suitable approach or entrance are not so good as either present site or Thirty-fourth Street site. Estimated cost, $1,000,000.

If the present site is to be retained, the solution that occurs to me as offering the least interference with traffic during erection is that of a two-span steel bridge, the main trusses of which can be erected outside the existing bridge. The erection of this bridge will necessarily at times interefere with traffic, its materials are not of the enduring nature of those proposed for the others, and its cost of maintenance will be greater. To give a proper entrance from M Street some property will have to be acquired. M Street is very congested and, while better than for the site just above, the entrance can not be made as good as for the Thirty-fourth Street site. Estimated cost, $975,000.

As I understood your request for information, this is a personal letter to you, and I am very glad, indeed, to give my views as now held. Of course, with authority and money for a thorough investigation, things might develop that would alter them materially. If you care to do so, I would be glad to have you come to the office, where I can show the layout on the maps.

I leave Thursday, the 6th, for Arizona, but hope to be back by the 24th or 25th.

Very respectfully,

W. C. LANGFITT,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

After a good deal of correspondence with the War Department the chairman of the committee received letters recommending the Carlin bill, but insisting that the State of Virginia and the District of Columbia share in the expense, and one of the letters concluded as follows:

If the committee has already decided upon the limits within which it desires to have the bridge built and should conclude to introduce a measure providing for immediate construction, it is suggested that the wording of the bill be sufficiently flexible to permit the department to select the best possible site within the limits designated.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. A. R. Serven, of the Washington Board of Trade, presented these resolutions to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

1. That the present Aqueduct Bridge be replaced at the earliest possible date with a modern commercial bridge of ample capacity to meet the requirements of the present and those of the future.
2. That this new bridge be placed at or as near the location of the present bridge as is practical and, at all events, not east of Thirty-fourth Street in Georgetown.
3. That any railway company or companies which may use said bridge be required to pay its or their proper proportion of the cost of said bridge, together with its or their proper proportion of the cost of the maintenance of same.

Very truly, yours,

J. HARRY CUNNINGHAM,
Secretary.

FEBRUARY 16, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one else wishes to address the committee, the Chair will announce that general debate is closed. The Chair would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the Chair understands the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has reported a bill in the nature of a substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a new bill. Without objection, the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the substitute and not read the original bill unless some Member wishes it.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman from Georgia ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the substitute as though it was the original bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I was going to suggest that the substitute and not the original bill be read, section by section, subject to all the rights and privileges that would prevail if it were the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that in the consideration of the bill the substitute be read, section by section, and treated as an original bill with the right of amendment that the original proposition would have. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a bridge across the Potomac River at or near what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, replacing said bridge with a substantial structure, at a cost of not more than $1,000,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I move to amend by striking out the period after "$1,000,000" and inserting a comma and also the words "and so construct it as to protect the interests of navigation."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by striking out at the end of line 2 the period, inserting a comma, and adding the words "and so construct it as to protect the interests of navigation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee anent the amendment that he has just submitted. I desire to inquire whether he believes that amendment will require the installation of a drawbridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is in the discretion of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I thought for one minute that it would result in the installation of a drawbridge, I would oppose this amendment, and for this reason——

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no idea that they will put in a draw.

Mr. STAFFORD. For this reason: I do not believe it should be the policy of this Government to encourage manufactories to be located along the beautiful shores between the rapids of the Potomac and the Aqueduct Bridge, which is in the nature of highlands along the shores, and that they should be preserved for their scenic beauty and not for any purpose of exploiting manufacturing along those banks. I listened to the argument made two weeks ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and then could not agree with him that there was any impairment or danger of impairment of the rights of navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that in none of the hearings, correspondence, plans, or specifications during the six years of continuous consideration has anyone ever suggested that the plans did anything else than to contemplate a bridge without a draw, and the amendment is put in simply to satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is very cautious.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consider the situation for a moment that he will not press this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. It will not do any harm.

Mr. STAFFORD. It might do some harm.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. The bridge will probably have a clearance of 30 feet above high water, and no craft that uses that section of the river would need a higher clearance. Whatever transportation of freight there is is now carried by the canal, which is alongside the river.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then what is the need of putting this provision in it at all, because in all the plans that have been recommended heretofore there is nothing that would impede the motor moats that now ply the river.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, there is no draw in the bridge at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. And why should we encumber this bill with a direction as if to say to the Secretary of War that we want to have it so provided that it is capable of future uses of navigation?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, while I differ with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the necessity for it, it is on a different ground. I differed on the ground that the department would do it without this amendment, but it is necessary that the Secretary of War shall so build it as to protect the interests of local navigation. It is right at the head of the harbor, and all sorts of little boats are running around there, and the Secretary of War, if he did not have any better sense, might so construct it as to interfere with the present harbor arrangements.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no navigation, in a commercial sense, above this bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; but right at the bridge there is. I have landed in little boats all around there.

Mr. STAFFORD. If we are going to despoil that mile and a half of water between the Highway Bridge and the rapids of the Potomac above by saying that one day it shall be dredged and manufactories placed on either shore, then I am strenuously opposed to this amendment. I can not see any necessity for putting this amendment in this bill. The present navigation of pleasure boats will be amply protected, because no bridge could be built that would impair that navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think that changes the present law at all? Does he not think the Secretary of War would do that without any such amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I think the Secretary of War might take that as a direction that he should so construct the bridge that it would be possible to use it with subsequent development of navigation on the upper river. I am opposed to that because I do not believe that beauty spot should be ever changed by the establishment of manufacturing plants along the sides of the river. It is a delightful camping ground for the people of Washington, and I do not wish to have it despoiled by manufacturing sites.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, referring to what my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has suggested, I would like to remind him that the million dollars that is to go into this bridge is not the money of the people of Washington; it is not the money even of the people of Wisconsin. They have the same interest in it and they have the same right to be considered in a matter of this kind as they would have with respect to a bridge being built over any other stream in this country. I am surprised that the gentleman from Wisconsin should show some little feeling against the manufacturing interests of the United States. I had no thought that the manufacturing interests were going to locate anywhere between this bridge and the Falls of the Potomac, the beauty of which he seems anxious to protect for those who are able to visit that vicinity and obtain some pleasure out of the construction of this bridge. I have been informed that the construction of this bridge is a matter of utility, that it is to be constructed for the convenience of the people of the Nation, although practically for the benefit of those who come from Virginia across the line into the District of Columbia and return therefrom. Why we should make an exception of this bridge, costing a million dollars of the people's money, or take it out of the purview of that legislation which controls all bridge construction in this country I do not know.

I wish to say that the interests of navigation, if there are any, ought to be protected. The gentleman seems to think that this is a special instance that ought to be taken out of the general rule. I do not think so. Whatever is navigable in fact, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, is navigable in law, and here is a statement that boats are coming and going under this bridge. What would the gentleman want even for the pleasure seekers whom he now delights to refer to? Does he want a bridge solidly built across this stream, so the water can not pass through? Does he want the engineers of the United States to be so awkward and foolish in their plans and specifications that they will build a solid structure, attempting to dam up the water between the bridge and the Great Falls of the Potomac? Does the gentleman desire that the engineers of the United States Government shall build a bridge in such manner that neither the water nor the boats can pass through? I think the gentleman's objection to this provision is very far-fetched. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], says, it is simply a reiteration of existing law, and gives specific direction where none was given in the bill. There can not be any objection to putting in this saving clause directing the Secretary of War that the interests of navigation, whatever they may be, on a navigable stream at this point, shall be protected. To dam up the waters, as the gentleman seems to think they want to do, would lead to the flooding of property, which would cause a great deal of trouble to the people of the Capital. I think this amendment is right, and hope it will be permitted to stand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes? Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I regret I have not been able to subscribe to the policy advocated consistently by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] of making navigable little fishing creeks and streams, that sometimes in the dry season you can spit across, and improving the inland waterways which are along the Atlantic coast and which are designed largely for pleasure purposes and not really for commercial navigation purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at the present moment. I do wish to say to the gentleman that it has been the policy of this Congress for a decade in the past not to encourage the development of manufacturing establishment in the District of Columbia. The District has a direct interest in safeguarding and protecting the banks along the Potomac above the Aqueduct Bridge to the Potomac rapids. Those banks on the Maryland side are exclusively in the District of Columbia. They could be developed for the purposes of manufacturing, and I can conceive of manufacturers who might desire to locate there.

The engineers of the War Department are not so foolish as to regard any direction from Congress in their authorization of a bridge to misconstrue it into the authorization of a dam, as the suggested fantasy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. We are carrying out the policy here of not wishing to have this stream made navigable to any depth, so as to preserve it in its present state, and that is my purpose in opposing this amendment. The gentleman in his advocacy two weeks ago submitted that it was desired to have the river there dredged for navigation purposes. I am seeking to retain that stream for pleasure purposes for the denizens of Washington who go there in large numbers during the summer, canoeing and the like, and who enjoy the outer life along its banks. Mr. Chairman, I can not see any real reason for this amendment, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any time left?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. STAFFORD. For a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much time has the gentleman remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman can yield time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I only yielded to the gentleman for a question. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that the expenditure of a million dollars for the construction of this bridge is solely for "the denizens of the city of Washington," as he has defended them in this instance?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not only for them but for the residents on the Virginia side; but I am trying to conserve and protect the pleasure grounds above the bridge, which are utilized largely by the residents of Washington. I do not want to see those beautiful shores despoiled by the building of any manufacturing establishments located along the banks of the stream.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman arguing that the expenditure of this million dollars is merely to create a bridge for pleasure purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am arguing for the construction of this bridge so that the people of Washington and visitors to Washington may have a safe means of going to visit the environs of Washington and Virginia, and especially Fort Myer, Arlington, and Mount Vernon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman this: So long as the gentleman has a prejudice against factories being built along this site because of the possible water power, would the gentleman object to the construction of breweries along that site?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am as much opposed to the establishment of a brewery as to any other manufacturing establishment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman have such an innate, inborn prejudice against water——

Mr. STAFFORD. Not for good, pure water; but for such water as that of the Schuylkill River, which the people in Philadelphia are sometimes compelled to drink.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is about the purest you can get, purer than the Milwaukee brand. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is always alert and active in the interests of navigation, and we often owe very much to his attention to such matters. I think possibly he may be slightly mistaken as to the effect of the amendment, however. The term "interests of navigation" is a term which we have constantly used in legislation, and it has usually been taken as implying all the interests of navigation which are on a river or which may possibly get on a river or a stream.

So now if we say that this bridge shall be constructed so as to preserve the interests of navigation the bridge must be so constructed that a steamboat or a sailing vessel can pass up the river beyond this bridge. That necessarily will require either a draw in the bridge or else that the bridge shall be located so high that the masts of a sailing vessel or the smokestack of a steamboat may pass beneath. The War Department has no other construction which it can put upon it, because wherever we use that term in the law the engineers are directed to protect the interests of navigation either by requiring a draw or by requiring a bridge constructed so high, as is the case at a number of places on the Ohio River, that vessels can pass beneath the bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman from Illinois concur with me that in constructing a bridge by the Government under the Government direction and supervision the Secretary of War would do under existing law what would be right and proper in the premises?

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that the Secretary of War, if authorized to construct this bridge, will of his own volition, and necessarily, protect the interests of navigation as navigation now exists on the river, because that is no difficulty at all. In fact, I know of no way that the Secretary of War could construct this bridge where he did not protect the interests of existing navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman think I was correct in maintaining there would be no necessity for this amendment?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman was incorrect in offering the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was trying to please my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MANN. I was seeking to reason with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that if this provision goes into the bill either the Secretary of War must require a draw or a very high bridge or else must lie down on the construction of the term which we usually put in bills where we do desire a draw or a very high bridge. If we authorize a bridge across the Ohio River, it requires a draw or a bridge under which any vessel that can operate upon that river can pass. I want that construction to remain. I do not want the Secretary of War to let down on a construction of the language which we use in order to protect the interests of navigation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, does not the general bridge and dam act provide that the Secretary of War shall protect the interests of navigation in the construction of any bridge?

Mr. MANN. It does. That would not apply to this one.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the reason I raised the question that this was being taken out of the general rule; that a bridge was to be constructed here which was not to come under the provisions of the general bridge law.

Mr. MANN. Now, that is the very thing——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman raises the point, and it is a very interesting one, that steamboats or sailing vessels, although sailing boats are rapidly going out of existence——

Mr. MANN. Lots of them come up the Potomac River.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are fast declining along the coast, I will say to the gentleman. If it is true that these vessels would have to be taken care of, then account would have to be taken of the depth of the stream leading up to the bridge, and I would ask the gentleman whether the depth of the water leading up to the bridge is sufficient to have us now regard the necessities of steam vessels or sailing vessels of a commercial nature?

Mr. MANN. If you put in this bill that the Secretary of War may preserve the interests of navigation, the presumption is that he must take notice of that; that it is the intention of Congress to deepen the water so that navigation can be actually carried on in the river. There is no navigation in the ordinary sense on this river up there now. There is no freighting business up there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The boats that are going back and forth are boats of small dimensions.

Mr. MANN. They are pleasure boats.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bridge would have spans to accommodate those boats?

Mr. MANN. I know of no way they could construct a bridge without them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My point was that it would not be a solid bridge.

Mr. MANN. It can not be a solid bridge there. There is no way of constructing a dam up there to put a bridge over. You could not do it for $10,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not this amendment protecting the interests of navigation be construed by the War Department to pertain to those vessels that pass back and forth under the present bridge?

Mr. MANN. I think there is no way of constructing a bridge without taking care of those vessels. I think the Secretary of War would take cognizance of that fact. It seems to me it would be a direction to the Secretary of War to construct a bridge under which steamboats coming up the river might pass; under which excursion steamers coming up the river might pass. That would require a draw or a very high bridge.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is right as to our ignoring the provisions of the general bridge and dam act, then those of us who vote against this amendment vote that the interests of navigation shall not be cared for in the construction of this bridge?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think that follows at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to arrange to have the debate end on this section.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And I would like to have a little time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this section and amendments thereto end in five minutes, that time to be divided equally between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for two minutes and a half.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think both my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] are unduly exercised over this matter. As a question of fact, in the ordinary sense there is no navigation above this bridge, except of the character that was at one time referred to in this House by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], being that carried on by love-sick individuals who were gazing mostly at the moon, and were likely to run upon shoals and sand bars, in any event. [Laughter.]

There are, of course, a few craft a little larger than rowboats—those launches that carry several passengers—and I would not have traffic of that kind interfered with, because I at one time participated in it myself with a great deal of pleasure. In fact, it would be impossible, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very well said, to construct a bridge such that these craft could not pass under. But no sailing vessel carrying cargo could possibly navigate the channel above this bridge, so that it seems to me that the fears of the gentleman from Wisconsin are not well founded. On the other hand, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] seems to fear that manufacturing will in some way be interrupted or interfered with.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was merely making a general defense against the view of our friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If there is any place any distance above the bridge where a factory could be located, I do not know where it is. There would be no need of a draw. That region is not at all suited for the construction of such establishments. It has not the necessary railway facilities. It is not sufficiently near to available labor, and therefore it seems to me that the bill as it originally stood was in the best form that it could be.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] commented upon the fact and rather complained that it is proposed by this bill to make an exception in legislation relating to the construction of bridges over navigable streams.

That may be true, but the circumstances are exceptional. There is but one National Capital. There are a thousand navigable streams, but there is only one National Capital City of Washington. Thus far it has been kept a residence center and the seat of Government. Upon grounds of high public policy it has been deemed best not to have Washington become a center of manufactures. Gentlemen will understand why.

The objection made by my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is, I think, perfectly good, that there can not be any reason for this anxiety to have navigation above this bridge, unless it is to accommodate manufacturers who may hereafter desire to locate there; and the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] strikes me as being absolutely unanswerable against this proposed amendment. We ought to make an exception in this case, because there is but one National Capital, and we wish it to retain the character that it has had from its foundation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing proper plans and for the payment of any lands, easements, rights, or property, and for the removal of the present structure, and immediately to commence the construction of said bridge and the approaches thereto.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer two amendments to that section. First, I move that, in line 19, page 3, "$300,000" be stricken out and "$150,000" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, strike out "$300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the Clerk if he has a copy of those amendments there?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will answer the question. There is no copy of any amendment at the desk.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. Strike out all after the word "property" and insert in lieu thereof the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 23, strike out all after the word "property" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all of the section after the word "property."

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 5, after the word "property," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, the plans and specifications herein authorized shall be so drawn and prepared as to insure the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto within the limit of cost of $1,000,000 as fixed herein. As soon as the plans and specifications are approved the Secretary of War shall give public notice of the specifications and invite competitive bids for the construction of the bridge and approaches thereto according to the specifications, reserving the right to reject any and all such bids."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire whether that means that $150,000 will be added to the million dollars for construction?

Mr. ADAMSON. The purpose of the committee was to provide $1,000,000 for the building of the bridge. Part of the $150,000 may be used to prepare for building the bridge. It will not cost that, unless they condemn some property, and we do not expect they will condemn much property, because I think the idea is to build the bridge near the old site.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the item passes, the bridge stands to cost $1,150,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. The bridge stands to cost $1,000,000. If the entire $150,000 is not all expended in preparing for the bridge, the balance will remain in the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then what is spent of the $150,000 will be in excess of the $1,000,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; because it does not go for the building of the bridge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the said bridge shall be used as a highway for traffic, and for gas and water mains, power, telegraph and telephone wires or cables upon such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, now using the Aqueduct Bridge, shall be permitted, with the approval of the Secretary of War, to change its location so as to cross with a double track the new bridge and approaches herein provided for, and to connect its railway, located in Alexandria County, Va., and in the District of Columbia, with the tracks of said new bridge; and that all plans for such change are to be approved by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That a standard system of electric propulsion shall be installed by said railway on said new bridge, and no dynamo furnishing power to this portion of the road of said railway shall be in any manner connected with the ground, and that the cost of paving and maintaining in good condition between the tracks and 2 feet outside thereof shall be paid by said railway: And provided further, That any electric railway chartered or that may hereafter be chartered by Congress shall have the right to cross said new bridge upon terms mutually agreed upon with the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway, or, in case of disagreement, upon terms determined by the Secretary of War, who is hereby authorized and directed to hear the interested parties and to fix the terms of joint trackage. And all electric railways, including the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway, using said new bridge shall, in addition to taxes and other charges prescribed by charter, pay monthly into the Treasury of the United States the sum of one-half of 1 cent for each passenger transported each way over said new bridge, and just and reasonable rates or charges on all freight transported thereon, and of these sums, when paid into the Treasury, one-half shall be credited to the District of Columbia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, after the word "conditions," in line 3, page 4, the words "and for such compensation."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 3, after the word "conditions," at the end of the line, insert the words "and for such compensation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move to strike out entirely line 21, on page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, strike out all of line 21, which line reads as follows: "chartered or that may hereafter be chartered by Congress."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire whether it is the purpose of this amendment, and others that the chairman of the committee intends to offer, to grant to any railway company the right to use the trackage over this new bridge without getting any authorization from Congress, but to leave it entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMSON. We are providing that after the Washington & Old Dominion Railway places its tracks on this bridge, then any electric railway shall have the right to use such new bridge upon terms determined by the Secretary of War, who is hereby authorized and directed to hear the interested parties and fix the terms of the joint trackage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then that would grant the right to any railway company which has charter rights at present to approach the termini, to use the tracks, upon the approval of the Secretary of War, without any further authorization from Congress.

Mr. ADAMSON. We are striking out anything about charters. We are going to provide, following exactly the terms of the general bridge act, that all electric railways shall have equal rights to use the tracks on the bridge. We are striking out anything about charters.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then any electric railway company that has the right to reach the termini of the bridge would, without obtaining any further authorization of Congress, have the right to use the tracks?

Mr. ADAMSON. It would have to apply to the Secretary of War to adjust the terms, unless there was some satisfactory arrangement between the companies.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not have to come to Congress to get the authorization.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; and that is true as to other bridges authorized by Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the general bridge act will apply as to railways, and so forth, under this bill, why will it not apply in the matter of navigation?

Mr. ADAMSON. The general bridge act provides for such bridges as are built by private capital, and the Secretary of War simply watches that private capital and makes it build the bridge exactly in the way that the Secretary of War would build it if he was doing it with public money. This is not a question of navigation. This is a question of how you will treat the instrumentalities of commerce which are expected to accommodate the traffic of the District of Columbia and the balance of the country, and we make the same wise provision for equality that prevails wherever any railroad wishes to cross any bridge. We provide that they must all be treated just alike; that is all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This section, as printed, provides that all electric railways, including the said Washington & Old Dominion, and so forth, shall pay so much for the use of the bridge. It also provides, at the beginning of the section on page 4—

That the said bridge shall be used as a highway for traffic, and for gas and water mains, power, telegraph, and telephone wires or cables upon such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where is provision made for these concerns to pay for the privilege of using the bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. Section 6, as just amended, provides—and for gas and water mains, power, telegraph, and telephone wires or cables upon such conditions and for such compensation as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That amendment as to compensation is new.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was not in the bill as printed?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; it has just been adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the matter of charging for the use of the bridge for gas and water companies and power, telephone, and telegraph companies is now covered by the amendment offered by the gentleman?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move to strike out the word "cross," in line 22, page 4, and to insert the word "use."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 22, strike out the word "cross" and insert the word "use."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move to strike out all of lines 23 and 24 on page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, strike out lines 23 and 24, which read as follows: "mutually agreed upon with the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway, or in case of disagreement, upon terms," so that it will read "That any electric railway chartered or that may hereafter be chartered by Congress shall have the right to cross said new bridge upon terms determined by the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that, beginning with the word "including," in line 2, page 5, and all of line 3, the words "including the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway," be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "including the said Washington & Old Dominion Railway."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend further by striking out the words, on page 5, line 5, "prescribed by charter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 5, strike out the words "prescribed by charter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of maintaining and repairing the present Aqueduct Bridge until the new bridge herein provided for is completed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 5, line 18, the figures "$50,000" and insert "$25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 18, strike out the figures "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia about section 7, whether that is a permanent or continuing appropriation, or whether that question has been considered by the committee. It reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That one-half of the entire expense of constructing said bridge, and its maintenance when constructed, including the amount appropriated in section 5 of this act, shall be paid by the District of Columbia and shall be set aside and deducted by the Secretary of the Treasury from any funds in the Treasury belonging to the District of Columbia and not otherwise appropriated.

Do I understand from that that one-half of the cost of the maintenance of the bridge is hereafter to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the District funds, without appropriation by Congress?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that we are not appropriating at all, and that that will have to come from another committee.

Mr. MANN. Why do you say "not otherwise appropriated"? You use language which may be considered as a permanent appropriation.

Mr. ADAMSON. We expect the appropriation to be made at every session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. The only place that I know of in bills where you use the term "not otherwise appropriated" is where you are making an appropriation of funds in the Treasury.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that we are building a bridge and prescribing a policy for operation, and our idea was that as the District of Columbia was to receive one-half of the benefits of the revenues it should also pay one-half of the upkeep as well as for the construction, and we use the words "not otherwise appropriated" as applying to the time when any repairs are necessary to be made.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman certainly does not mean that. "Not otherwise appropriated" has nothing to do with the time. The intention is plainly that the cost of the bridge and the maintenance shall be paid one half by the District of Columbia and the other half from the funds of the Treasury. When we say that we say enough.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman's idea is to strike out the words "not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MANN. I was trying to get the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], sitting beside the gentleman from Georgia, to see that proper language was used. He is the chairman of the Subcommittee on the District of Columbia, and plainly we do not want to make a permanent continuing appropriation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the matter to which he calls attention escaped my notice in reading the paragraph. I have no hesitation in saying to the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill in the Committee of the Whole that, in my judgment, the last four or five words ought to be stricken from section 7. It ought not to be made in that form, but left to the appropriation bill when the appropriation is made.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it would be safer, and fully accomplish the purpose, to strike out all after the word "Columbia," in line 14.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the words are necessary, and therefore I move to strike them out.

The CHAIRMAN. We have passed section 7, but if there is no objection the amendment will be considered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

Page 5, line 14, strike out, after the word "Columbia," the following language: "and shall be set aside and deducted by the Secretary of the Treasury from any funds in the Treasury belonging to the District of Columbia and not otherwise appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia to line 18, page 5, striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$25,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House the bill, recommending that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 759) to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in place thereof, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a substitute was read for the bill reserving all the privileges of the original bill, and that substitute is one amendment.

The SPEAKER. That has all been taken care of in the adoption of the amendments.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER, MINN. AND WIS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 3032, authorizing the county of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman desires that it be passed over without prejudice I am quite willing, otherwise not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman kindly indicate to the House if there is any likelihood of his failing to object to the bill at some subsequent date if it is not passed over without prejudice? There is no use of passing it over from time to time if he is ultimately going to object to it.

Mr. LENROOT. I hope an adjustment of that controversy will be made at some time, but I can not give the gentleman any assurance now.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman indicate what adjustment will be sufficient to cause him to change his attitude respecting this bill?

Mr. LENROOT. That would involve a statement of 15 or 20 minutes in length, and I do not believe the House cares to go into that matter. I am willing to either let the matter go over without prejudice or to object.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think it is fair to the House to have this bill constantly at the head of the calendar if the gentleman is going to object. I can not see, and no one else can see, why he should object——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

ASSISTANT INSPECTORS, STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4786) to provide for the appointment of certain assistant inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, at ports where they are actually performing duty, but to which they are at present detailed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this bill is upon the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he expects to take up the rest of the day in debating the bill?

Mr. GARDNER. No; I want to speak for only about 15 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman be willing to waive that privilege until a little later in the evening? My engagements are such that I am compelled to leave in a few moments, and if the gentleman will wait until some time later in the day it would be a very great accommodation to me. This bill has already been debated.

Mr. GARDNER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the eighth paragraph of section 4414, Revised Statutes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"And in addition the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, in districts or ports where the exigencies of the service require, assistant inspectors, at a salary for the port of New York of $2,000 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La., the districts of Philadelphia, Pa., Baltimore, Md., the port of Boston, Mass., and the district of San Francisco, Cal., at $1,800 per year each; and for all other districts and ports at a salary not exceeding $1,600 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,500 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual and reasonable traveling expenses incurred in the performance of his duties, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the bill was discussed the other day thoroughly, and I do not care to detain the House further at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill amending the eighth paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, so as to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to appoint assistant inspectors in districts or ports where the exigencies of the service require."

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 755) to incorporate the Boy Scouts of America, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Colin H. Livingstone and Ernest P. Bicknell, of Washington, D. C.; Benjamin L. Dulaney, of Bristol, Tenn.; Milton A. McRae, of Detroit, Mich.; David Starr Jordan, of Berkeley, Cal.; F. L. Seely, of Asheville, N. C.; A. Stamford White, of Chicago, Ill.; Ernest Thompson Seton, of Greenwich, Conn.; Daniel Carter Beard, of Flushing, N. Y.; George D. Pratt, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Lee F. Hanmer, Jeremiah W. Jenks, Charles P. Neill, Frank Presbrey, Edgar M. Robinson, Mortimer L. Schiff, Lorillard Spencer, and James E. West, of New York, N. Y.; G. Barrett Rich, jr., of Buffalo, N. Y.; Robert Garrett, of Baltimore, Md.; John Sherman Hoyt, of Norwalk, Conn.; Charles C. Jackson, of Boston, Mass.; William D. Murray, of Plainfield, N. J.; and George D. Porter, of Philadelphia, Pa., their associates and successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic of the District of Columbia, where its domicile shall be.

SEC. 2. That the name of this corporation shall be "Boy Scouts of America," and by that name it shall have perpetual succession, with power to sue and be sued in courts of law and equity within the jurisdiction of the United States; to hold such real and personal estate as shall be necessary for corporate purposes, and to receive real and personal property by gift, devise, or bequest; to adopt a seal, and the same to alter and destroy at pleasure; to have offices and conduct its business and affairs within and without the District of Columbia and in the several States and Territories of the United States; to make and adopt by-laws, rules, and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the United States of America, or any State thereof, and generally to do all such acts and things (including the establishment of regulations for the election of associates and successors) as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and promote the purposes of said corporation.

SEC. 3. That the purpose of this corporation shall be to promote, through organization and cooperation with other agencies, the ability of boys to do things for themselves and others, to train them in scoutcraft, and to teach them patriotism, courage, self-reliance, and kindred virtues, using the methods which are now in common use by boy scouts.

SEC. 4. That said corporation may acquire, by way of gift, all the assets of the existing national organization of Boy Scouts, a corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia, and defray and provide for any debts or liabilities to the discharge of which said assets shall be applicable; but said corporation shall have no power to issue certificates of stock or to declare or pay dividends, its object and purposes being solely of a benevolent character and not for pecuniary profit to its members.

SEC. 5. That the governing body of the said Boy Scouts of America shall consist of an executive board composed of citizens of the United States. The number, qualifications, and terms of office of members of the executive board shall be prescribed by the by-laws. The persons mentioned in the first section of this act shall constitute the first executive board and shall serve until their successors are elected and have qualified. Vacancies in the executive board shall be filled by a majority vote of the remaining members thereof. The by-laws may prescribe the number of members of the executive board necessary to constitute a quorum of the board, which number may be less than a majority of the whole number of the board. The executive board shall have power to make and to amend the by-laws, and, by a two-thirds vote of the whole board at a meeting called for this purpose, may authorize and cause to be executed mortgages and liens upon the property of the corporation. The executive board may, by resolution passed by a majority of the whole board, designate three or more of their number to constitute an executive or governing committee, of which a majority shall constitute a quorum, which committee, to the extent provided in said resolution or in the by-laws of the corporation, shall have and exercise the powers of the executive board in the management of the business affairs of the corporation, and may have power to authorize the seal of the corporation to be affixed to all papers which may require it. The executive board, by the affirmative vote of a majority of the whole board, may appoint any other standing committees, and such standing committees shall have and may exercise such powers as shall be conferred or authorized by the by-laws. With the consent in writing and pursuant to an affirmative vote of a majority of the members of said corporation, the executive board shall have authority to dispose in any manner of the whole property of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That an annual meeting of the incorporators, their associates and successors, shall be held once in every year after the year of incorporation, at such time and place as shall be prescribed in the by-laws, when the annual reports of the officers and executive board shall be presented and members of the executive board elected for the ensuing year. Special meetings of the corporation may be called upon such notice as may be prescribed in the by-laws. The number of members which shall constitute a quorum at any annual or special meeting shall be prescribed in the by-laws. The members and executive board shall have power to hold their meetings and keep the seal, books, documents, and papers of the corporation within or without the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That said corporation shall have the sole and exclusive right to have and to use, in carrying out its purposes, all emblems and badges, descriptive or designating marks, and words or phrases now or heretofore used by the Boy Scouts of America in carrying out its program, it being distinctly and definitely understood, however, that nothing in this act shall interfere or conflict with established or vested rights.

SEC. 8. That on or before the 1st day of April of each year the said Boy Scouts of America shall make and transmit to Congress a report of its proceedings for the year ending December 31 preceding, including a full, complete, and itemized report of receipts and expenditures, of whatever kind.

SEC. 9. That Congress shall have the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is to be an amendment offered to the bill.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, that is correct. It is to strike out the name of one of the proposed incorporators.

Mr. MANN. Who is not an American citizen.

Mr. CARLIN. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer to amend by striking out, on page 1, line 8, all after the word "Illinois," down to but not including the word "Daniel," in line 9.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "Illinois," strike out all of the language down to but not including the word "Daniel," in line 9.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CARLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9691) authorizing leave of absence to homestead settlers upon unsurveyed lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9691.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9691, with Mr. MURRAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9691) authorizing leave of absence to homestead settlers upon unsurveyed land.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to avail myself of the rules of the House which enable us to speak on any subjects which we choose when the House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House of Representatives for several days has been engaged in one of those exasperating performances which make the average man in the street itch to strangle every one of us. Half of us have been embarked in a maneuver to escape the cold hillside of a yea-and-nay vote on the question of American passengers on armed merchantmen, and the other half have been jockeying over the precise nature of the rule under which we are to take up the McLemore resolution.

If I came from a district where the sentiment was half pro-German and half proally I have not much doubt that I should follow suit and execute every kind of a skirt dance rather than let the pestiferous question come to a vote. Fortunately for me there are very few, if any, Germans in my district, so it is not difficult for me to support the President.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. As the gentleman is an authority on parliamentary law, this being the first Monday of this month, being individual suspension day, can not any gentleman get up and move to pass the McLemore resolution, to suspend the rules and pass it, and have a direct record vote on it at this time regardless of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or the rules of the House or anything else except, of course, the Speaker's recognition?

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman has to have the recognition of the Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. Of course he has.

Mr. GARDNER. And he has to have a two-thirds vote to pass it.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; to pass it; but I am talking about a record vote. He can also move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, with an amendment which he may have striking out everything after the enacting clause and putting in anything else he wants to, so if the gentleman wants a record vote on the McLemore resolution, or a substitute to it, all he has to do is to get recognition from the Speaker in order to have it.

Mr. GARDNER. And a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MANN. It is like saying that all a man has to do to go to heaven is to die; one is just as ridiculous as the other.

Mr. GARDNER. I think what the gentleman from Tennessee says is absolutely true as a matter of theory, but as a matter of practice there is only one way to get the McLemore resolution before the House, and that is by a report from the Committee on Rules.

As you all know full well, neither the McLemore resolution nor any other resolution dealing with this armed-merchantmen question can come before this House unless a majority of the Committee on Rules can come to an agreement. A majority must agree both on the nature of the resolution which is to be proposed for our consideration and likewise on the method under which we are to consider it.

The Committee on Rules, practically speaking, can bring in to the House any rule which it wishes. That is to say, the committee can propose or, as we call it, report to us a rule providing for the consideration of any measure under the sun in any way under the sun. It is for us to say whether we adopt or whether we reject the rule proposed. If we adopt the rule proposed, we then proceed to consider the measure to which it relates. On the other hand, if we beat the rule proposed, that ends the matter, and the measure, whether it is the McLemore resolution or some other resolution, does not come to a vote at all. That is precisely what many gentlemen are aiming at.

Now, the maneuverers who want no record vote on this awkward question hope to secure the assistance of those Members of the House who may be dissatisfied with the particular form which the rule for the consideration of this resolution may ultimately take. They likewise count on the votes of those Members—and there are a few—who sincerely believe that the President has no business to ask us to act on the McLemore resolution. Of course they can count on the votes of many Members who are afraid that their side will be beaten if the main question comes to a vote. The maneuverers are sanguine that this combination of forces may result in a majority against the adoption of any rule proposed by the Committee on Rules, and thus a yea-and-nay vote on the main question may be avoided.

To say, as many persons do, that the Republicans are practically a unit against the adoption of a rule is absolutely untrue as will conclusively appear before long.

A few of us Republicans had a meeting in my office this morning and immediately afterwards seven or eight petitions were started out on the Republican side of the House asking the Committee on Rules to report a rule so that we might have a vote on the McLemore resolution. Those petitions, by the way, have been very extensively signed and there will be more signatures unless, as is rumored, the Committee on Rules has already come to an agreement to report a rule such as we seek.

Mr. Chairman, while I deny that the Republican side of the House is overwhelmingly against a rule for the consideration of the McLemore resolution, nevertheless it can not be gainsaid that some of the Republican leaders are against it, and at this identical moment are working tooth and nail to defeat it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Not at present. I will when I get through.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this House wishes the respect of the country there are two things which we must not do. We must no longer delay a record vote on the armed merchantmen question and we must vote for or against a real resolution of warning, not for or against a humbug resolution of warning, which would mean nothing and would still leave our attitude a matter of doubt.

What I mean by a real resolution of warning is a resolution notifying American citizens, through the President or otherwise, that if they travel on the armed merchantmen of belligerent nations we shall abandon them to their fate. What I mean by a humbug resolution of warning is a resolution merely expressing the sapient opinion of this House, or of both Houses, that to travel on an armed merchantman belonging to a belligerent is an unpatriotic thing to do. Everyone of us knows at heart that a resolution of this latter sort is an adroit evasion of what the people of the country believe to be the issue. The McLemore resolution, with all its faults and vices, is a genuine proposal.

Personally I should prefer to see the vote come directly on the adoption or the rejection of the McLemore resolution, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," and my reason for that preference arises from the fact that it has been heralded to the world that the fate of the McLemore resolution is the test by which the attitude of this House is to be judged.

Moreover, I am not unmindful of the fact that the McLemore resolution was considered plenty good enough by its supporters when they thought that they had sufficient votes to carry it.

Any difficulty which we have with the parliamentary situation and any ambiguity which may surround our action will be entirely our own intentional handiwork or that of the Committee on Rules.

The parliamentary tangle can easily be straightened out if the Committee on Rules wishes to straighten it out, and our action can be made as clear as crystal unless we purposely confuse it.

Mr. SIMS, Mr. MANN, and Mr. COLEMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wants to talk, I have no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] resumed his seat.

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will pardon me a moment, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN] wants to ask me a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yielded the floor, and I asked for recognition. The gentleman from Massachusetts has not the floor. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. I did not yield back the balance of my time. I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN] to ask me a question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I will yield for that purpose. The Chair erroneously was trying to take me off my feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask if the gentleman from Massachusetts yielded the floor?

Mr. GARDNER. I did yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will then take his seat.

Mr. MANN. And I yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yields to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COLEMAN. I would like to ask if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I thought I had an hour on this bill which is pending before the committee, and I yielded 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. How can you take the time away from me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that you had an hour, and you will get the rest of your time later.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to ask for recognition as against the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who was entitled to the floor, although he did not rise to take it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Somebody was talking.

Mr. MANN. That was not my fault. The gentleman ought to have been attending to business. But I do not desire to take the balance of it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. COLEMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, if the House is to pass upon the McLemore resolution, should it not have ample time to discuss the measure on its merits?

Mr. GARDNER. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the rule provides for four hours' discussion. I should think that was reasonable.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he will yield, so that I may ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman spoke of having an answer as clear as crystal on this proposition. Would he say that the action of another body on this matter was as clear as crystal?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly not. The Senate was the victim of its own rules. Even if Senator GORE had warned the Senators six months beforehand of what he was going to do, they could not have helped themselves. Under their own rules they could not come to a vote excepting on the question of tabling the Gore resolution in whatever final form the Oklahoma Senator chose to present it. The Senate had to vote on the motion to table the Gore resolution just as it stood. The Senate could not amend it. So the Senate did the proper thing and tabled the whole business. The Senate was helpless. But we are not at the mercy of any individual Member. We are only at the mercy of the Committee on Rules, but we are not at its mercy one moment after it has reported a rule to the House. We can not force the committee to present a report, but once a report is presented we can do what we choose with that report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has charged the membership of the House, in the consideration of the matters to which he referred off the floor, with having been actuated, first, by partisan reasons, and, second, by fear of how their constituents might treat their votes in the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in such matters, is entitled to speak for himself, but for no one else in the House. [Applause.]

I do not believe that either side of the House, in giving private consideration and discussion to the questions at issue to which the gentleman has referred, has been actuated either by partisan motives or by fear of votes at home. If there is anything to the question at all, it is too grave and great for the patriotic men of this House to determine how they shall act by base methods, as is suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Applause.]

I have not been in favor of bringing the matter before the House at all. I have been quite content to let the House attend to its constitutional duties [applause] and to let the President attend to his constitutional duties [applause], thinking that if at any time the President desired the action of the House he would come before the House or Congress and say so. [Applause.] There has been no complaint to speak of—at least voiced on the floor of the House—in criticism of what the President has done; certainly not from the Republican side of the House, and I think not from the Democratic side of the House. But gentlemen now insist that we shall record our views—upon what? Upon a grave question of international complications, or upon a resolution which somebody dropped in the basket, and which resolution no one in the House had ever heard of or read until the matter was urged to be adversely acted upon. Nobody was asking that the resolution be passed. Some people suppose that when a bill or resolution is introduced into the House it is matter of great moment. Anybody who is a Member of the House, and nearly anybody who is not, can secure the dropping into the basket of a formal matter, a bill or resolution, relating to anything under or above the sun, and the House does not treat these things too seriously. I dare say there are few Members of the House who would say that the McLemore resolution, so called, expressed his sentiments or his position; and I undertake to say that a majority of the Members of this House, if they expressed their opinions, are of the opinion that American citizens at this time ought not to complicate the situation by traveling in armed merchant vessels. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman of the opinion that a majority of this House thinks we ought to abandon those American citizens if they do disregard that warning that the gentleman has given them?

Mr. MANN. I think that when that question arises we ought to meet it [applause]; but I hope that our citizens may be so advised that we shall never be put to the test whether we have to fight because some fool had entered upon a joy ride or voyage. [Applause.] If we leave the matter as it is, we have expressed no opinion. We have left the situation to the wisdom and the discretion of the President. But if we are forced to vote simply and solely upon the proposition to table the McLemore resolution, which is the proposition which the Committee on Rules will submit to the House, and we vote to table the resolution, we have voted that we invite American citizens to travel on armed merchant vessels, with the assurance that we will go to war if they do. [Applause.]

I am in favor of keeping out of war, if it is possible. [Applause.] Who is it that proposes that we have a square vote? Not the gentleman from Massachusetts. He thinks that we ought to have a square vote on the McLemore resolution, but that we ought not to have a square vote on what we think ought to be done. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen may say in denunciation of those with whom they do not agree that certain propositions are "fake" propositions. My idea of a "fake" proposition usually is one that I do not agree with. [Laughter.] Is the gentleman from Massachusetts, or anyone else in the House who is going to vote with him, willing that the House shall have a chance to amend the McLemore resolution? [Applause.] Putting up a man of straw and knocking him down is a favorite device, but it gets no one anywhere. If the President of the United States, for whom I have respect, desires to know what the Members of the House think upon a proposition, he certainly must desire to know what they honestly think upon it. [Applause.] If we take no action at all in the House, to that extent we do not endeavor to bind the hands of the President or to influence his conduct; to that extent it is a vote of confidence. But if we insist, or the Committee on Rules or the House insists, that we shall vote upon a question of grave international importance, I do not propose to register the will of anybody else, but to register my own judgment. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is recognized.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I never did believe in crossing a bridge until I came to it, or in anticipating trouble which may never arise, and especially when it is a matter which certainly is not now our concern, and I hope never will be.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] was mistaken in saying that the Senate was the victim of its own rules. It was no victim at all. It did the right thing, to kill whatever proposition came up under which Congress assumed without invitation to meddle with the diplomatic affairs of the country, which are peculiarly and constitutionally in the province of the President. [Applause.]

It makes no difference what the merits, what the substance of the resolution, or which side of any proposition the resolution favors, it ought to be defeated in the shortest and quickest and best possible way.

The question now, however, is not what the language or substance of our action should be, whether for or against the President's position; that is immaterial. It is none of the business of Congress to interfere with diplomatic relations at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have not time to yield. I am trying to tell the gentleman some truths, but he does not listen. I agree that if an American citizen has not sense enough to keep off of a belligerent ship—if he thinks advice will be more impressive than torpedoes—I am willing that we should continue our warnings in thunder tones, as has been done; and that warnings should come from the President and his Cabinet and Members of Congress, all the way down, but it is not necesary that Congress should do everything. The notice given, however, should not be for the illogical reason assigned by some gentlemen, that if these people are warned of their danger this Government will not be responsible if they are destroyed, but because their presence on such ships may involve this country in complication with other nations.

If you pass a resolution now to warn them off these belligerent ships and say we will not be responsible, it would be regarded as a wholesale license to murder American citizens on any ships.

It is an international right of any neutral or noncombatant to ride on any merchantman or liner which is a ship of commerce hurrying from port to port and seeking no fight, whether armed or unarmed, and is not a battleship nor, like a battleship, carrying no commerce but seeking a fight. [Applause.] I do not care to discuss pro or con an international proposition that is now in the province of the President. I do not care to decide now whether I will vote to go to war or not. I do say it would require a very grave situation to induce me to involve my country in war. It may not be, as some Member has said, that I would not do it until an enemy actually invaded the district I represent here, but there would have to be danger of invading that or some other district in the United States. I certainly would not vote to go to war on account of anyone like the fellow who was proud and comforted that he saved his bulldogs, although he had allowed his mother to drown, in case of a ship torpedoed. The proper course for us to pursue here is to perform our constitutional duties and let diplomatic affairs alone and allow the President, who has managed them so successfully and gloriously for the last 18 months, to continue to do so, and I believe that with equal skill and wisdom he will continue to save us from trouble.

INTERMEDDLING OF CONGRESS.

The intermeddling of Congress is as liable to produce international complications as is the folly of the citizens in riding on ships of the belligerents. The point is, which all patriots ought to see plainly, that it is the President's business to manage diplomacy concerning our foreign relations and that Congress ought to do and say nothing until the situation should assume such shape that the President would be compelled to call on Congress for action. It is not necessary for Congress to become nervous and try to anticipate that sort of a situation and try to take action before the necessity arises. If we attend to our own business, that crisis may never come. The President has steered us clear of trouble pretty well for the last 18 months, and if Congress will let him alone he will so continue, in my judgment. [Applause.]

The thing for us to do is, whether by tabling, by direct vote, or in one way or another way, to put the death stroke as soon as possible on any resolution, no matter what it is, no matter whose views it conforms to, which affects the business of the President and means the assumption of a task which does not really rest upon us. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois erroneously contends that the course pursued by the Committees on Rules and Foreign Affairs with regard to the McLemore resolution is ridiculous and farcical. He insists that the resolution was already dead and as securely nailed on the table as it will be after the proposed action under the rule to lay it back on the table; but the gentleman remembers that under the rule it was taken from the table, where the Committee on Foreign Affairs placed it, on the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] and placed on the calendar in conformity with a rule of the House. Now, when the action of the House to-morrow votes the McLemore resolution back on the table, it will not be competent for any Member to have it taken from the table and have it placed on the calendar again, so it was certainly not nailed as fast to the table under the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as it will be when voted back there to-morrow under the rule reported by the Rules Committee.

What would have been thought of us and what would have become of our commerce and our infant Republic if during the Napoleonic wars Congress had been craven enough to warn American citizens that if they undertook to sail the high seas and were injured by the warring nations our Government would not be responsible? What would have been our aspect and the plight of our commerce if instead of cleaning out the pirates in the Mediterranean and the buccaneers in the Caribbean Sea Congress had passed a resolution warning our people to avoid ships in those waters, as this Government would not be responsible for outrages inflicted on American citizens? Our duty is plain and clear. Stick to our business and as quickly and emphatically as possible drop or kill all interference with the President's prerogatives, and let the world know that Congress is squarely behind the President in his diplomacy. Then, in my honest judgment, it will never be necessary for Congress to act on these questions at all. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor simply because I made an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] when he was on his feet. To-day is the first Monday in this month, and under Rule XXVII is suspension day for individuals. The third Monday in the month is suspension day for committees. To-day any Member of this House can rise in his seat and move to suspend the rules and pass the McLemore resolution just as it is, or he can move to suspend the rules and ask for the passage of the McLemore resolution with any amendment that he may offer, even to the extent of striking out all of the resolution except the resolving clause, and then putting in anything that he may see proper, with his motion to suspend the rules and pass it as amended.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee has the same privilege of moving now that the McLemore resolution be laid upon the table. Why does he not try it?

Mr. SIMS. Wait a moment and I will tell you. The gentleman from Illinois will not contend that I am stating the rule incorrectly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not stated it correctly at all, according to my notion.

Mr. SIMS. Let me inform the gentleman that it is within the rules of this House to move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution just as it is, or with such amendments as any gentleman may offer in his motion to suspend.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, what the gentleman said was that any Member of this House, this being the first Monday in the month, could rise and move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. Now, the gentleman knows that is not a correct statement.

Mr. SIMS. Why is it not correct?

Mr. MANN. Because he can not; that is the reason.

Mr. SIMS. Tell why.

Mr. MANN. In the first place, a man in order to move to suspend the rules must have the recognition of the Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. That is provided in another rule.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker does not recognize gentlemen for motions to suspend the rules on Mondays until late in the afternoon. Then he has the calendar on his desk for suspension of the rules; and the gentleman knows as well as I do that a great many Members of this House are already promised recognition by the Speaker for the suspension of the rules on other matters and that the Speaker would have no moral right to do this. Now, if the gentleman believes what he says, why does he not move to suspend the rules and dispose of the McLemore resolution? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, of course I did not think that any Members of this House would for a moment suppose that he could make a motion without recognition. Of course, I knew he had to have recognition. I do not know what is on that calendar. Personally I have not said a word to the Speaker. I do not know whether he would recognize me or anybody else to make this motion; but when the gentleman from Illinois stood up there and described this question as one of the most momentous and one that may be fraught with such interest to our country as he has pictured, I will never assume, until I know I have to assume it, that the Speaker of this House would not recognize him to make a motion in order that he might offer an amendment that would express the feelings and real motives of the Members of this House. I do not know whether the Speaker would recognize the gentleman, for I have not said a word to him about it; but no little unanimous-consent matter and no ordinary bill should get in the way of taking the proper action in the right way, as described by the gentleman from Illinois, on a matter so important as this; and I want to say to him, without having said a word to the Speaker, I do not believe, if he believes as the gentleman from Illinois does as to the great importance of having a direct vote, that he would decline to grant recognition for such reasons as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman know that the Speaker himself had decided that he can leave the Unanimous Consent Calendar when he gets ready, and recognize gentlemen for motions to suspend the rules even if the Unanimous Consent Calendar is not exhausted?

Mr. SIMS. I really do not know whether the Speaker has taken that position or not.

Mr. GARDNER. The Speaker has so ruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I would like one minute more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. SIMS. I am not in favor of the resolution. That is the reason I have not risen to make the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MANN. The resolution has been laid on the table, and being on the calendar where it is impossible under the rules to reach it, the gentleman is going to vote to lay it on the table again.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Illinois wants a real test, let him offer an amendment which he now has an opportunity to offer in the way I have pointed out.

Mr. MANN. I will offer the amendment if I have a chance.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield, Mr. Chairman, 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that every man in this House is agreed upon the one proposition that he regrets the situation should have arisen which requires expression on the part of the membership of this House touching an international matter that is more or less acute at this time, but that regret has no practical bearing now. There has arisen a situation which makes it essential that the House of Representatives express its view. Now, why? It is true that the dropping in the basket of a resolution means nothing, but after a resolution is dropped in the basket and such agitation is had informally, it is true, not on the floor, but elsewhere, as to cause the newspapers of the country to carry it out as one of the matters that was imminent in the House, and when, following that, statements are made by men in high and responsible positions in the House that such a resolution—and mark you, the resolution was not only a resolution of warning but a resolution of repudiation of responsibility in case the warning was disregarded—I repeat that when men in high and responsible positions in the House carry to the world the statement that such a resolution would, if it came up, pass by a 2 or 3 to 1 vote, and the effect of that information or misinformation is to paralyze the Executive arm in dealing with international affairs, he has to use that common sense that should always characterize a man in his position in coming here and saying to the House, "I ask of you such action as will go to show what I consider the rights of America, represents the will of the American people or does not." Here is the position. It is not whether we shall go to war because some fool sees fit to travel when he ought not. Oh, no; there is a great controversy touching sea warfare. One of the belligerents insists that because of facts that have developed touching that warfare that it is entitled to change the rule of international law as it existed when the war broke out so as to affect the rights of neutrals. America stands to-day as the one great Nation that can defend the rights of neutrals, and the day is coming in this world in the time of progress when the belligerents will learn that they are the outlaws, that they have only such rights as a peaceful world is willing to give them [applause], and that peaceful world has not simply such rights as it can take away from the outlaws of the world.

Now the President is standing for a great international issue. It may be that men conscientiously think that they are voting a warning simply as an indication of caution, but that is not the effect of it. The logical effect of it is that this Nation is not prepared to protect men in this right, and that right means more than in my time I can go into. It means much more than the approval of foolhardiness in traveling on a ship. Since the war broke out I have arranged for more than 20 Americans to come back to their country, and many of them had to travel on merchant vessels belonging to belligerents. Is America going to say that they are not to be protected in their right not to be killed, not to have a peaceful ship sunk without warning? If that be true, what need for dispute over the Lusitania? If the right is only to be upheld when it can be upheld without any risk to us, God pity this country. [Applause.]

I am for my country, and I believe in standing for its real rights, let the risk be what it may. And men by foolish talk, by forcing an issue, giving aid, not intentionally but actual aid and comfort to the nation we are in controversy with, have made it necessary that this House shall say to the world that the President does not speak for himself alone but for all the people of America. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to speak to the McLemore resolution, which will come up to-morrow under a rule that will probably admit of no general debate.

It was written long ago, in language so clear, concise, and simple that the wayfaring man could not misunderstand it, that "Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand," and "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation." To-morrow we shall subject ourselves to the crucial test that will determine whether this House shall stand or fall. Our action on the resolution will proclaim to the world that we will either stand together and support our Chief Executive in his supreme struggle to maintain the honor, the dignity, and the prestige of this Nation, or that we have divided our House and caused it to fall in utter ruin and as an impassable barrier across the perilous pathway in which the President is successfully leading his people in peace while all the rest of the world is bleeding to death from the ghastly wounds of war.

The passage of the resolution would bind the President's hands, annihilate his authority, and silence his tongue. It would be a confession that we have abandoned the right of making the law of nations to the international outlaws on the other side of the water; that we have repudiated the Declaration of Independence, and bowed the knee in fear and trembling before the brutal belligerents of the old world.

Some say that the rejection of the resolution will mean war. On the contrary, it will mean continued peace; for when the war-crazed nations of Europe once know that this country is united, from the White House to the Capitol and from the Capitol to the firesides of a hundred million patriotic people, then our rights will be respected in every land and our flag will be honored on every sea. But if the rejection of the resolution should mean war—and no one shall go before me in opposing war or in confidently believing that we shall have none so long as we refrain from meddling with the President's business—but if the rejection of the resolution should mean war, were it not a thousand times better that we should all die in the trenches and national honor live than that we should all live to see the honor of this Nation ignominiously die?

This is a contest between European empire and the American Republic; a contest between might in the Old World and right in the New; a contest between military despotism and the peace-loving President of the United States. In such a contest I, for one, am against every foreign potentate, prince, and power—the world, the flesh, and the devil—and with the President of my country.

In God's name, let the resolution die and let the honor of the Republic live in unsullied grandeur forever and forever. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is a broader question than whether Americans shall be warned not to travel on armed merchant vessels of belligerents. It is a broader question than whether Congress has the constitutional power to warn American citizens not to exercise what is their undoubted right. It is a broader question than what has been the practices and the precedents of this country. The issue we are to vote upon to-morrow presents a question of whether in diplomatic negotiations going on between the Executive of this country and a foreign Government we shall stand with our President or with a foreign Government. [Applause.] It is whether you are going to stand with America or a Government with which America is negotiating; and when that time comes, Mr. Chairman, when that issue is presented, I believe that every patriotic Congressman—and I believe we have none here but patriotic Congressmen—will be found standing behind the President and behind this country. [Applause.]

I regret that this matter has had to come before Congress, but it is not the first time that the House of Representatives during my service here has had to deal with a question of this kind. In the Sixty-first Congress the gentleman who now so ably represents a New York district, Mr. BENNET, introduced into the House a resolution requesting the President to enter into negotiations with Great Britain for the annexation of Canada to the United States. At that time "our President" was negotiating a reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, and I recall that he sent for Mr. FOSTER, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and myself, and said to us that the Bennet resolution, although it had just been dropped into the basket and was quietly resting in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was hampering his negotiations, and he asked us to report it out with an adverse report; and we took it up, and every Democrat and every Republican upon that committee, except Mr. BENNET, voted to carry out the wishes of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. If I have the time.

Mr. BENNET. And when the committee had reported it adversely, and it had gone on the table under the rules of the House, the House left it there, did it not?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, in that instance we took the action that the President of the United States, in his wisdom and with the knowledge he had of the diplomatic situation, asked us to take. A more serious question confronts us to-day. We know that we have talked in this House about warning resolutions, and it has gotten in the newspapers, and the impression has gone abroad that the House of Representatives favored the McLemore resolution warning Americans to stay off armed merchant vessels and disavowing responsibility for their safety if they traveled upon them. That impression has hampered the President in negotiations with the German Government, and he asks action just as President Taft did, though he desires us to go further than was deemed necessary in the case of the Bennet resolution, because the situation is more serious. Action now in the way the Foreign Affairs Committee has recommended would do more to keep us out of war than to pass the warning resolution in any shape. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I have not the time.

Mr. GOOD. For just a question?

Mr. FLOOD. If I can have a minute or two in which to finish.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will grant the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think, then, that under the present circumstances the House, irrespective of the convictions of the Members, ought to vote with the President, whether they think the President is right or wrong in this emergency, especially when the President, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, asked us for a vote upon this question?

Mr. FLOOD. I think in this emergency, in this crisis, it is the duty of patriotic Congressmen to stand with their President and with their country. [Applause.]

The President asks for this action. We recognize his constitutional right to deal with these matters, to carry on these negotiations unhampered. He knows how he has been hampered and how much he has been hampered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield me another minute?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield one more minute to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. He knows, and we do not know, the extent to which he is and has been embarrassed by exaggerated reports of what has taken place in the cloakrooms, and we should give him this vote.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. No. There is no man in this country who has tried so hard to keep this country out of war as Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] I do not see how a patriotic American can take the slightest action that will prevent the success that has so far characterized his efforts in that direction from reaching full fruition. [Applause.] To-day we are the only great Nation upon the face of the earth throughout whose borders peace and prosperity walk hand in hand, and we owe that to the cool, calm, courageous man at the other end of the Avenue. [Applause.] I believe in this crisis it is our duty, when the rule comes up to-morrow, to vote for the adoption of that rule, and, when the McLemore resolution is submitted to this House, to vote to lay it on the table. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the prevailing excitement I will, in an effort at self-restraint, begin with the reading of a resolution which I introduced a few days ago, and which I believe meets the situation.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 170) constituting a declaration by Congress of the policy and intention of the people of the United States toward the belligerent nations.

Whereas the President of the United States has called upon Congress to uphold him in his view of the rights of Americans traveling in armed merchantmen carrying the flag of a belligerent nation; and

Whereas the belligerent nations, in their struggle to survive in the contest, have disregarded vital interests of neutrals in comparison with which the claim of the right to travel in armed merchantmen sinks into insignificance; and

Whereas the prevailing apprehension among the people of the United States that an attempt may be made to enforce American rights and claims by means of war, makes it imperative that a definite and unequivocal declaration of the policy and intentions of the United States toward the belligerents be made by Congress: Therefore be it.

Resolved, etc., That Congress solemnly declares its unalterable opposition to war as a means of enforcing the claim that Americans may travel in armed merchantmen of belligerents.

That Congress solemnly declares that, except when repelling an enemy invading the territory of the United States, there can be no justification for a resort to arms.

We are discussing in advance a rule which the Committee on Rules is to report to-morrow, and which will prevent any action on the McLemore resolution except that of tabling the resolution. The McLemore resolution proposes to warn Americans off armed merchantmen flying the flag of a belligerent nation. The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommends that the resolution be tabled. It will be made impossible to amend or improve the resolution. All discussion will thus be choked off. A matter of unprecedented magnitude, involving the gravest problem which can present itself in the life of a nation, will be disposed of, if the judgment of the committee prevails, without any discussion whatever. What a dangerous mistake; what a serious blunder! We are advised to refuse to consider on its merits a proposition which forms the subject of obstinate contention between our Government and that of another nation; a proposition which, we are told, involves the rights of neutrals under international law; a proposition the dispute about which threatens to bring this country to the brink of war.

The President asks that Congress declare itself on the subject. In his letter to the acting chairman of the Committee on Rules he says, in substance, that his ability to negotiate a settlement of the controversy relating to the rights of Americans to travel in merchantmen armed for defensive purposes is being destroyed by reports that Congress does not indorse his views.

What does the committee recommend? It recommends that we lay on the table the McLemore resolution. Will that be an approval of the President's attitude? Will that mean that Congress believes there is no distinction between an armed and an unarmed merchantman? Will that mean that Congress seriously thinks that a merchantman armed for defensive purposes will resist the temptation to destroy a submarine on sight and before the submarine has accomplished its intended harm? Or shall we assume that an armed merchantman will carry guns for the purpose of offering friendly salutes and offering courtesies to the enemy submarines? Why, the captain of an armed ship who will permit a murderous submarine to come within striking distance has a mighty poor conception of his obligations.

The difficulty lies with the permission to use the submarine at all. The submarine is a thievish sort of a thing. It works quietly. It works stealthily.

Will our vote here mean that Congress is determined to go to the extent of permitting a rupture of diplomatic relations with the Government of a friendly nation? And after diplomatic intercourse has been severed, then what? War? Wholesale murder? Death and destruction? Chaos? The most powerful neutral Nation engulfed in the maelstrom?

I refuse to treat the subject lightly. I can not treat the request of the President as a command to agree with him. We should rather welcome his invitation of action by Congress as an offer to cooperate with the Chief Executive in determining the foreign policy of the Republic. We are, after all, some kind of a democracy. I am almost inclined to offer a vote of thanks to the President for the opportunity to extend the principle of democracy to international relations. The President asks for an expression of opinion. In order to obtain a collective expression of opinion we must have a thorough discussion and exchange of views.

Had the nations of Europe been given the opportunity which is now offered to Congress by the President there would have been no war in Europe. I insist that we must defeat the motion to lay on the table. Let us face this big problem as men should face a big problem. The motion to lay on the table is a subterfuge. We can not follow the method of the Senate, which acted first and debated afterwards.

What is really in the minds of the people is the fear and apprehension of war. We have been going the way of the other nations. The great masses of the people are not interested in the quibbles of international law. After all, international law is more or less of a myth. It exists principally in textbooks. There is not a nation which has not disregarded fundamental principles of international law whenever it suited its purpose, either in times of peace or in time of war. There seems still to prevail in international law "the good old rule, the simple plan, that they should take who have the power, and they should keep who can."

Between wars the nations of Europe have been amusing themselves by more or less forcible invasion and occupation of territory of small nationalities and small peoples. In war times nations powerful enough to disregard a rule relating to the game of war have not hesitated to do so.

This is a titanic struggle. The very nations that helped frame this code of so-called international law are participants in the contest. Each contesting party interprets the law as best suits its interests.

We owe an answer not only to the President but to the people of the United States and the rest of the world.

We are in a dispute with one of the belligerents. Disputes between nations have recently been terminating in war. What the people fear is that we are driving toward war. We have had resignations of members of the Cabinet. We have our war party as the countries of Europe had which joined in the war after August, 1914. There are here those who now talk, as of a simple business proposition and as a matter of course, about our need of participating in the war.

First of all it is this apprehension that must be allayed. It is this fear that must be dispelled. That can not be done by a motion to lay on the table.

An appeal is being made in the name of international law. The great masses of the people are under the impression that international law means a code of rules which prescribes the conditions under which war is justifiable. Now, we all know that is not so. The conception of international law which exists in the minds of the masses is superior to the international law which we find in the textbooks. So far as war is concerned, the textbook international law deals primarily with the rules of the game of war and does not attempt to formulate a moral code for the guidance of nations in their mutual intercourse. We should utilize this opportunity to lay down a rule of conduct for the guidance of this Nation and for the enlightenment of others. We owe it to the world to declare that we will not waive any right of neutrals, but that we will not resort to the use of physical force; that we will not employ the Army and the Navy to compel compliance with our view of international rights. What we should do is not to table the McLemore resolution, but permit a free and full discussion of the entire subject; and, above all, we should adopt a clear and unequivocal declaration to the effect that, first, we have no quarrel with the people of any European nation; second, that any dispute which we may have with the government of any of the belligerents shall be submitted, after the passions of the war have subsided, to the determination of a board of arbitration; third, that we refuse to resort to physical force as a means of compelling respect for our rights.

In its report the Committee on Foreign Affairs submits that—

> In the practice and precedents of this country the conduct of diplomatic negotiations has been left to the President, and with this practice the committee does not feel it proper to interfere. We know that if the President reaches a point in any negotiations with foreign Governments at which he has exhausted his power in the premises he will, in the usual way, report all facts and circumstances to Congress for its consideration.

The committee evidently fails to grasp the full meaning of its own words. The committee leaves open the question whether it is within the power of the President to terminate diplomatic negotiations. This should not be left open. An emphatic answer should be given not only to the President but to the people. Not only to the people of the United States but to the rest of the world.

Secret diplomacy and the absence of democracy in international relations which secret diplomacy involves has been the curse of mankind.

Diplomacy had its origin among the small Italian States and developed to its present importance when most of the nations of Europe were monarchies, in the government of which the people had no voice. The sovereigns, on the theory that they were anointed by God to rule over the respective nations, exchanged diplomatic agents.

The people had no voice in determining the internal policy of the States, and much less in determining the policy toward other nations. Diplomacy became an art. Had diplomacy consisted in telling the truth it is doubtful whether it would ever have become an art. The diplomat was supposed to play the part of a spy and was regarded as one. While theoretically representing the nations, the diplomats in fact represented the sovereigns, their intrigues, their designs, their schemes. Strangely enough, this notion of personal diplomacy, representing the person of the sovereign, has survived in our great democracies.

A few days before the war the peoples of Europe had no notion that calamity was so near.

This Government is founded on the idea that only such governments may exist as have the consent of the governed; that only those laws are to be obeyed in the making of which the people have had a part. How strange that simultaneously with these theories of government within the geographical limits of the Nation the people should permit their international relations to be determined by secret diplomacy!

The United States has no secret designs against any nation. We can afford to say openly and to the world all that we have to say.

The extent to which this one-man diplomacy is untenable appears in the very complaint of the President, in which he says that it has been reported in European capitals that there is divided opinion on a certain subject in America. Why, there is only one way in which to prevent a division of opinion, and that is to prevent the people from thinking or giving expression to their thoughts. This course has been pursued in several countries of Europe by sentencing to imprisonment those who dared to attack monarchical institutions. Why should we, the 435 Representatives of the people, elected by the people, permit the question of war and peace to be determined by an individual? And why should any individual undertake the task?

The fact that the Constitution vests in Congress the power to declare war would necessarily imply that it also vests in Congress the power to determine those conditions which, if not controlled by Congress, would lead to war.

Is there any doubt that with the generally prevailing notions of national honor and with friendly intercourse interrupted and diplomatic negotiations terminated, with the patriotic fervor aroused, Congress may be put in a position where it will vote a declaration of war in spite of the innermost convictions of its individual Members?

The diplomacy which has been playing one nation against another and working havoc with all of them should not be ours. Diplomacy which gives one man the opportunity to make war inevitable can not be ours.

I intend no reflection upon the President of the United States. He has had an extraordinarily difficult task imposed upon him. It is not against his theories that I raise objection. It is with Congress that I am having my quarrel.

We can not long exist as a Republic within the limits of our own territory and permit monarchical notions to survive in the realm of international policy. And as we have inherited from the days of monarchism our notions of diplomacy, we keep on repeating, without analysing their meaning, the phrases coined by that very diplomacy.

We speak of fighting for national honor. What is national honor? I contend that there is only one people that can violate the honor of the United States, and that is the people of the United States. A nation, like an individual, must faithfully observe its obligations. And to the extent to which a nation meets its obligations to the rest of the world it is honorable.

There can be no such thing as offending national honor. One may offend national pride or injure national interest. Let us not confuse national honor either with national pride or with national interest. If a nation had failed to carry out its obligation to us, an obligation which it has assumed either by implication or in explicit terms, it has not offended our honor, but it has injured our interests.

If the injury is of a serious character, the practical problem that will present itself to the people will be to determine the extent of the injury that has been inflicted or that is threatened to be inflicted upon us. To what extent are our interests threatened? To what extent is our welfare adversely affected? Is the injury irreparable? Can we forego the advantage which would have been ours had the obligation not been violated? Thus presented, the people of the United States would be able to intelligently determine whether the advantage they lose by reason of an injury to their national interest is of a nature which would warrant the people in resorting to arms. Then each man would be able to search his own conscience and answer to himself the question whether he was ready to shed the blood of a fellow man in order to retrieve a possible financial or economic loss. And there is not any doubt that the great majority of every enlightened people would rather forego many economic advantages than destroy one human life.

There may be an injury to national pride. The attempt to punish a nation for an injury to national pride always assumes the character of a war for revenge. We can not accept the code of honor of revenge. We can not accept "vendetta" as our moral law. Unfortunately, we are victims of the very phrases which we coin. We talk about international law while in truth the difficulty with international law is that it has no international sanction; that the great nations have been defying it in times of peace and in times of war; and that there has not grown up among the masses of the people a definite conception of what the relation of one nation toward another should be.

We talk about national honor, forgetting that in almost all cases national honor is either national interest or national pride.

The people of the United States abhor war and tremble at the very suggestion of it. Let us allay their fears. A fear to do a wrong is not an ignoble fear. There is no glory in bloodshed. There is no glory in modern warfare. Secret diplomacy decides upon war, and men who have been forced into the armies by conscription are marched against one another. The men in the front ranks are not always the bravest. They are very often placed in the front ranks because they have offended against army discipline. The men in the second line are instructed to shoot the men in the first line as soon as the latter turn their backs. The men in the third line are instructed to shoot the men in the second line under the same circumstances. And so from the beginning to the end, we have the human machine driven by the threat of destruction—forced into destroying his fellow man.

How long will we be slaves of meaningless phrases? How long will we permit combinations of words which long ago lost their significance to act as substitutes for thought?

Modern war eliminates the necessity for physical courage. It does not require any particular bravery to hide in trenches or to shoot at an invisible enemy with long-range guns.

THERE IS SOME TALK ABOUT COWARDICE.

The American people can certainly not be charged with cowardice in this instance as there is no particular bravery required in joining 10 nations in attacking one.

Let us preserve the opportunity to be the peacemaker in this contest. It may involve some humility. The peacemaker is always kicked about by those whom he seeks to restore to their senses.

Whatever difference of opinion we may have with the Governments of some of the European powers we have no quarrel with any of the peoples of Europe. The average American will shrink from the thought of shedding the blood of a German or Austrian, of an Englishman or of a Frenchman, as he would shrink from shedding the blood of his brother. We underestimate the humanity of the American people.

Let us give notice to the world that the code which justifies the use of physical force to settle international disputes has been repudiated by the American people. Such a declaration will be a greater boon to mankind than the Declaration of Independence which laid the basis of this Republic.

The Socialist movement, in the name of which I speak, has in all countries and at all times opposed war and anything that would lead to war. It has opposed oppression of nationalities. It has resisted imperialism and colonial conquest. It has opposed the maintenance of armies and navies. It has everywhere demanded that international relations should be conducted in the open and by the representatives of the people, and it has insisted that every nation, no matter how small, be given full scope to develop its genius. It has not hesitated to tear away the mask of hypocrisy which in the name of law enables the strong of each nation to grind its own weak. It brands as hypocrisy the international law which permits the crushing of the weak nations by the stronger. It has always contended for an international code of morality which would enable the nations of the world to live in peace and to settle their disputes through international arbitration and not through the arbitrament of war.

In season and out of season I will urge the need of a higher code in our international relations. In season and out of season I will repeat the warning of the Socialists—the warning which has been disregarded by the nations of Europe, and for the flouting of which Europe is paying a heavy penalty to-day; the warning that there is no civilization worth while which is not based upon free men within each nation and upon free nations in the brotherhood of nations.

I submit that House joint resolution 170, which I read in the beginning of my address, is the proper resolution to be adopted in lieu of the McLemore resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, it was no feeling of party loyalty nor desire to pay a tribute to the present occupant of the White House that was responsible for my action as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. To my mind the broad question was, How far shall the President of the United States be interfered with in this crisis? How far shall we go in interfering with him? You gentlemen of this body, do you know the facts that are under consideration by the State Department? Are you conversant with the facts that are there in the archives? How far will you go in interfering to-day with that department in dealing with other Governments?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I have only two minutes. I do not know the situation that confronts us to-day. I think few men in America know. I do know that we are in one of the worst crises that this country has ever been called upon to face and in which the President of the United States has preserved the peace of this country. I believe there are few men could have preserved that peace with the dignity and honor that has been maintained. [Applause.] Feeling this way, Mr. Chairman, realizing conditions that are almost intolerable across the water, knowing that we have from time immemorial vested the right of conducting foreign affairs in the President of the United States, I ask this House to stop and consider before any action is taken for which we may repent too late. The President has not exceeded his authority, he has not transgressed our powers in this matter. This is our flag, our country, and our Executive. Let no personal or party consideration influence any Member against that which is due them in this crisis.

I beg this House will stop and consider whether we shall palsy the hand of the man into whose keeping we have placed the power of directing our foreign affairs. A blow at that power now is a blow against our flag and our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire to reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. MANN. I first yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the American people understand very well what the situation is. They know the character of armament now being carried on the merchant ships of certain great powers. They know the orders given to the masters of those vessels. They know that, without regard to what treatment they may be accorded by the attacking enemy, there is bound to be a fight when they meet and some one is certain to get hurt; that is likely to bring about international complications leading to war. And, knowing this, the American people are in favor of having our citizens warned to keep off these powder ships. [Applause.]

Further than that, the American people will not be fooled by any fake appeals to patriotism or any buncombe appeals for loyalty to the President when the question of loyalty to the President is not involved. The question is, Shall we be loyal to our convictions and loyal to our country? That is the question before us. It is not true that the warning of American citizens from armed merchant ships is an international question. No one dreamed that it was an international question until it was suggested from certain quarters. It is not true that action by Congress warning Americans from armed ships will in any way embarrass this Government in its negotiations with foreign States. The question is a purely domestic one, and it is one for us to determine.

It is true that if this House voted squarely on the question of warning our people from armed merchantmen and voted its convictions, such a warning would have the vote of at least two-thirds, if not three-quarters, of the Members of this House. That is so true that certain gentlemen who know it is true are trying to dodge the issue and, to a certain extent, they have been able to dodge the issue by presenting this matter to the House in a way making it impossible to have a square vote on a simple, plain proposition of warning.

The gentleman from Massachusetts and those who agree with him do not, in my opinion, want a square vote on the simple proposition of warning. There are people in this country who insist that American lives shall be sacrificed and American honor shall be put in jeopardy to insure the cargoes of certain American exporters. That is the proposition contained in a refusal to warn our people off these armed ships. The question is not one of diplomacy; it is not one coming wholly within the purview of the duties and responsibilities of the President. It is a duty and responsibility resting on us as representatives of the people to say, that in the condition of affairs now existing relative to the merchantmen of the world, armed to fight, purposed to fight, intending to fight, we warn our people to keep out of that kind of danger imperiling their lives and the peace of their country. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in world affairs we have come to a juncture when we might well exclaim with Mark Anthony, "Oh, judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts and men have lost their reason." The people of the United States expect us to maintain our sanity. They do not expect the Members of this House to lose their reason, even though madness stalks abroad on the other side of the Atlantic. [Applause.]

I have heard several gentlemen to-day speak of our national honor. I yield to no man in love of country or in a feeling of pride for the honor of the United States. To me our national honor should be maintained pure, unsullied, stainless. But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have come to a condition under which we have established a double standard of national honor. I remember a few weeks ago when 18 American young men—money earners, if you please—went into Mexico to find employment in the mines of that country. They were massacred in cold blood while en route to the place of employment by a band of Mexican insurgent soldiers. The people of the United States were horror-stricken when they heard the awful news. The relatives of the murdered men appealed to our Government to endeavor to have something done to bring the murderers to justice and prevent a repetition of such an outrage. It seems to me that our national honor was involved in that instance. But the relatives of these men were told that their loved ones had gone into Mexico at their own risk. That they had been warned not to go into Mexico, and having refused to accept the warning they virtually took their lives into their own hands. That is one standard of national honor that has been set up by this administration.

And now, because some American wants a thrill, because some money spender, some blasé, foolhardy citizen wants to do something in order to spur his jaded appetite, we have another standard, a second standard of national honor; a standard that possibly might bring us into war because of some willfully foolish act of some reckless American citizen. Mr. Speaker, the American people do not want war. The American people do not propose to get into this European conflict. They look to us to keep them out of it. And the Congress and the President will find, if anything is done to bring this country into this European war, that, in the final analysis, the consequences, if war should come, will be placed upon the shoulders of those who will be responsible for forcing the country into war. I for one am satisfied that the Congress will do its duty; it will gladly take its share of responsibility. But it should also leave to the Executive his share of responsibility. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that some gentlemen are seeking to evade the very question upon which the President of the United States desired that this House should vote. A week ago he wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Rules asking that Congress express its views on one of these several resolutions that have been pending in the committees since the opening of the session, and, so far as I know, those resolutions would be pending there still if it were not for the fact that the President of the United States insisted on the House voting on one of the resolutions with the hope that it might be defeated.

The newspapers for a week have set it out in the headlines that the President of the United States was demanding a "show-down." I for one believe that the President is entitled to a "show-down." I believe that he is entitled to know whether the Members of this House favor a resolution giving warning to American citizens or whether they are opposed to it. Under this proposed plan this House intends to deny him that which he has asked for. It seems to me it would be far better and more manly to vote on the resolution to the end that the President may know what our convictions are. Presumably that is what he wants, and that is what he will not get under this plan to lay on the table.

When we have voted on this question to lay this resolution on the table, the President will not know how a single Member of this House stands on that question, except those who may have an opportunity to express themselves in debate on the floor. He will not know from the vote that is taken to-morrow on the motion to lay the resolution on the table where any Member stands on this proposition. The people of the country, our constituents, will not know where we stand on that question. The people in the capitals of foreign nations, if it makes any difference what they think about it, will not know, when we have taken this vote to lay on the table, whether the Congress of the United States approves the course of the President in his diplomatic negotiations or whether it disapproves that course.

And so I submit to you that that is the situation, whether or not we ought to take a vote to lay this resolution on the table, or vote on the resolution itself, and let not only the President but the people of the country know just where the House of Representatives stands.

Now, I say to you frankly that I am in favor of a resolution to warn American citizens to stay off armed vessels. I would not vote to deduct from the rights of Americans on the high seas, but a plain resolution of warning does not take away any right. It has for its sole and only end the high patriotic purpose of saving life and insuring peace. It does not involve any international question at all. It is a question between the Government of the United States and the people of the United States, and the purpose, or at least the purpose that I will have in mind when I come to vote on the resolution, and I dare say the purpose of the Members who have introduced resolutions of warning, was to save the lives of American citizens and to avoid complications with foreign nations that tend to involve us in war. [Applause.]

Is not that a worthy motive, if warning the American people of the dangers of ocean travel in armed vessels would tend to save the lives of American citizens and to avoid complications with the belligerent powers of Europe? Then the President ought to gladly make this warning. Suppose the President when the war began had warned American citizens of the dangers of ocean travel and called to their mind that the death of American citizens on the high seas might engulf this country in serious complications, it would doubtless have saved some of the lives of those which have been sacrificed, and might have avoided some and maybe all of the incidents that have arisen by the sinking of ships carrying American citizens.

The President came nearly doing so in August, 1914. The President did issue a warning to the American people urging neutrality. Neutrality in thought as well as in action, and his purpose in that warning, the only purpose that he could have had, was to keep our country free from complications that might involve us in that awful struggle.

Let me read you a part of what he said in that warning:

> I venture, therefore, my fellow countrymen, to speak a solemn word of warning to you against that deepest, most subtle, most essential breach of neutrality which may spring out of partisanship, out of passionately taking sides. The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action. We must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.

Might we not consider that if it is our duty as American citizens to curb our thoughts and our actions, to curb our sentiments and our transactions, it is equally our duty to curb a desire to travel the high seas, a thing that will much more likely involve the Nation in difficulties and in international disputes than anything we might say or do at home.

When the President made that utterance a year and a half ago I felt that it was a wise and patriotic utterance. To curb our words and deeds in order to maintain a national neutrality is no sacrifice of American rights. To desist traveling the high seas in armed ships is no surrender of the rights of an American. A warning to the thoughtless and to those who travel the seas in time of danger to satisfy the spirit of adventure is not a denial of their rights to do so. It is a precautionary step which the President, Congress, and the press of the country ought to take in the interests of patriotism and peace.

Gentlemen who will vote to lay this resolution on the table will not be able to fool the country by making them believe that it is a vindication of the President or that it will strengthen his hands in his negotiations with foreign powers. It will not do so. The country will understand that it is a pure evasion by the House of the question, and instead of being a help to the President it will be seized upon as a hindrance. It will have no tendency to curb the acts of those who want to sail the seas. It may multiply instead of lessen the difficulties which arise in our foreign affairs.

These gentlemen can not say that a vote to lay the resolution on the table means a vote against the resolution. Gentlemen may try to satisfy their consciences and their constituents by saying that when they voted to lay the resolution on the table they voted against the resolution. But the President and the country want to know how they would have voted on the resolution if it had been submitted to this House. If a vote to lay on the table is a vote against the measure, then why this parliamentary fluke of laying it on the table? Why not submit the resolution itself to a yea-and-nay vote, so that every Member will show the country just where he stands, and that the country, the President, and the world may know the attitude of this House on the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, it has been well said by the leader of the Republican side of the House that there has been nowhere any intimation of interference with the prerogatives of the President of the United States, or any suggestion that this House meant in any way to curtail his constitutional rights.

But we find a demand made upon this Congress to give an expression of its opinion in regard to what has been characterized or denominated here as a great crisis. We have heard of the President himself in public declarations saying that war was only at arm's length, that it might occur to-morrow or in a week. And now we have Members on this floor to-day stating that there is information in the archives of the State Department that would make us tremble if we knew of it.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, if war is as near as that, and there is information in the possession of this Government of that character, I would like to know what patriotic citizen, be he President or anybody else, would withhold it from the sovereign body of Congressmen, the Representatives of the people, to whom, as the designers of the Constitution well provided, is intrusted the power to declare war, as a direct expression from the people, and to whom we are accountable. While the makers of the Constitution curtailed the powers of the President, they gave an unlimited sway in that regard to the Members of Congress. [Applause.]

Therefore, wherein is Congress subordinate or subservient to the President, and why instead is it not our duty to call on the Chief Executive to make a show-down by dignified message or some agency of mutual confidence than to submit to his attempt to "big stick" the death of a resolution that is vague and obscure and which can only confound and confuse as to its purpose and effect? This resolution and the method of attempting to kill it is unworthy of this great body, and especially at this time. If the President wants the resolution to be lifeless, it is that now; then why the absurdity of bringing it back to life only to kill it again? The action to-morrow on this question will prove no man's patriotism nor will it detract from any Member as to his love for his country. When I speak I do so for a section of Pennsylvania, seventeenth congressional district, which gave Lincoln his first troops, the Logan Guards, when followed thousands of men as brave as any, including Gen. John P. Taylor, Gen. Hulings, Gen. William McCall, Col. Gilbert Beaver, and that heroic student-captain of Bucknell University, Andrew Gregg Tucker, while the unspeakable tragedy of death and flame when Chambersburg was devastated by war's cruel hand, are all a token of that burning patriotism that will again be unloosened if ever a foe dishonors that sacred flag. [Applause.] There will be no faltering and no failing if war comes, which the record of history guarantees. But the people do not want this country to become involved in war as the result of the madness of the enthroned bosses of Europe, and history will wonder and marvel, then condemn this Congress if we accept the challenge as to our patriotism based upon such a rayless, obscure, and beclouded document as this resolution. If a call were to come from the President ringing true with confidence and the worthy assurance that Congress will back him in every patriotic purpose he makes clear to this body, there would be a unanimous response, but he can not expect concert of action on this sort of table juggling and shuttlecocking of a resolution which may be fraught with peril to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks and print in the RECORD as part of these remarks my personal observations regarding this subject made in an editorial in the Lewisburg (Pa.) Saturday News of March 4.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

WAR'S FEARFUL FLAME.

There is much said these days about "standing by the President" in the matter of the resolution suggested for congressional action with respect to warning Americans to keep off of armed ships or merchantmen of belligerent nations. There is no contention on the part of the President's bitterest opponent that his assertion as to boarding these armed ships bound for ports in the war zone where submarines are operating is not technically right or correct according to international law, even though the law is by no means clear on account of the appearance of the submarine as a recognized instrument of warfare since any treaties or understandings on the subject have been had with the warring nations. The President has so constantly changed his mind on public questions that many members of his own party have expressed themselves as weary following his somersaults and political gymnastics, and the measure of warning was designed as a method of precaution to keep the country out of any possible rupture and conflict with any other country. It has been shown that the American flag has not yet been fired upon by any belligerent, and it is not likely that it will be, so the President seems to be beating up a straw man to answer his political purposes and excite the people into a cry of "stand by the President." The ships the much-discussed resolution was meant to sound a warning against are armed vessels ordered to repel attacks and to attack. They were armed by the belligerent Governments, and expert gunners are in charge of the 6-inch guns they carry. Unprejudiced opinion can not regard these so-called merchantmen flying the flags of belligerent nations, and in many instances heavily laden with war material, as anything other than auxiliary cruisers.

In any event, the country is not going to back the President in any slam-bang war propaganda when the nations at war are not bothering us and will not bother us, and the great common sense of the people calls for sanity about traveling on armed ships and under foreign flags when there are plenty of ships flying the American flag crossing the seas which have not and will not be molested. Common prudence would dictate what we ought to do and thereby keep out of the other fellow's fight, which England would no doubt rejoice to see us become a party to.

Right, wrong, or even foolish, the people will "stand by the President" and the flag and the rights of nations on land and sea if we get into a mix up, but to prevent such a contingency would it not be better to stand off a bit while the world is in flames instead of trotting around with a chip on our shoulder when the other fellows are in a fighting mood? The war can not last much longer, hot heads will cool and normal conditions must sooner or later prevail, and the American people are not going to applaud any act of the President that will lead us into war just because of some diplomatic red tape and a condition not yet made clear as an international proposition due to the coming of the submarine as a new force and factor in warfare.

A little while ago the President declared this Nation "is too proud to fight." Whether merely a fanciful expression or not, it is not so. For our rights, for our flag and country we will fight only too quickly, and the Germans, the British, and the rest know all about this, hence their great caution to keep away from ships flying the American flag. But the President has suddenly changed from being "too proud to fight" to bullying Congress and setting himself up as the whole Government, forgetting the precedent established by President Cleveland in the Venezuelan affair and President McKinley in the Cuban situation. In both cases Congress was called upon to solve the problems. The people rule directly through Congress and not through the President, hence the President gets beyond his business when he attempts to drive the people's representatives to do his will now that he seems to have changed from proud complacency to a warlike attitude.

Commenting on the question of Americans going on or staying off of armed foreign vessels flying foreign flags, the Pittsburgh Leader of recent date says:

"It is a misfortune that President Wilson has used the party club on Congress and forced his foreign policy, if it may be called a policy.

"It is unfortunate, because Americans who trust to the protection of President Wilson are reasonably certain to lose their lives on belligerent ships.

"It is unfortunate, because President Wilson is actually inviting Americans to run grave risks, trusting his promise of protection which he can not deliver.

"It is unfortunate, because governmental warning would save lives that are now quite certain to be lost.

"The world is in flames, and it is childish to stand around and make speeches about the rights of people to be protected from fire.

"His wishes and desires cut no figure. However much he may want to protect the technical rights of Americans, he can not save them if endangered, or avenge their deaths if killed. He can't do anything, and it is unfortunate that he continues to pretend he can.

"All his diplomacy has not brought back one life lost. For months he wrote and wrote, threatened and threatened, and all the while the conditions he threatened punishment for kept right on. Neither England nor Germany has swerved a hair's breadth.

"Lives would be saved and all danger of war averted by the simple expedient of ordering Americans to stay off belligerent ships."

Mr. ADAMSON. I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, what is it the President of the United States wants? Gentlemen have indicated that he has been hampered in the performance of his constitutional duty. In what respect has the House of Representatives, which has been severely criticized throughout the country, hampered the President of the United States? Has the President of the United States come to the House of Representatives with a message upon a subject of world-wide interest involving any possible catastrophe to the people of this Nation?

I well remember, Mr. Chairman, when asked, along with my fellow Members, to stand by the President in another instance. We were told that the honor of the flag was at stake in Mexico. I voted to stand by the President then, in the war upon Huerta, the provisional President of that country. Did we sustain the honor of the people of the United States in that controversy? Was my vote to stand by the President in vain?

What is it that the President wants now? This House has constitutional privileges and prerogatives. Have they been consulted at all in this transaction up to date? Has the President exercised his constitutional right of calling upon this House to confer with it in a matter pertaining to the honor of the Nation?

What are we expected to vote upon? Is this House informed as to the conditions that seem to be familiar to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? If report be true, the President sought to smother the McLemore resolution in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Ten days thereafter, if report be true, he sought to have the resolution voted upon. How can we vote upon that resolution in its present form and satisfy the President? Please tell us where the President stands, and what he wants the Representatives of the sovereign people to do. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], I think, fairly stated the situation that will be before this House to-morrow; and the effect of their statements was that this House would to-morrow determine whether it will sustain the present policy of the President of the United States upon the international question of law concerning armed merchantmen to any extent that may be necessary to maintain the position which he had taken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Germany or any other belligerent nation is interested in the attitude of this House only in one respect, and that is how far will the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States go in sustaining the President. And we have only one constitutional duty to perform in that respect, and that is the making of a declaration of war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared, as a Member of this Congress, to decide that question now. I am not willing either to vote to sustain the President of the United States to the extent of war upon this question nor ready to vote that under certain circumstances I would not so vote; and so, Mr. Chairman, when the proposition comes before the House to-morrow I shall vote against the rule bringing up the matter for consideration, as I voted against it in committee to-day, because I want to keep myself free and untrammeled to vote upon that question when the question properly comes before the House. [Applause.] Those who are in favor of declaring war if Germany will not yield will, of course, vote to adopt the rule and table the resolution.

I do not want any inferences to be gathered that this House has committed itself one way or the other upon that most serious and important question, but I want to leave it in the hands of the President of the United States, where it now is, until the time shall come—which I hope never will come—when the House must consider it in the performance of its constitutional duty. On the other hand, if the President of the United States desires the advice of this House upon the attitude that he shall take with reference to this question, then let him come before the House with a message to the Congress, giving the reasons for his action, asking for affirmative action; and I, as a member of the Committee on Rules, whether I believe in the policy proposed or not, will gladly vote for a rule that will permit this House to express itself upon that affirmative proposition. But until that time comes, Mr. Chairman, this House ought not to commit itself either for or against war, ought not to commit itself upon these very grave problems, but ought to leave them where they now are, in the hands of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think there can be little doubt in the mind of any man that if this McLemore resolution had been called up for action in the committee it would never have been reported favorably to this House as it stands. I think there can be little doubt that if it had been reported favorably it never could have passed the House in its present form. The reason is not far to seek, because the resolution contains a lot of matter that would not meet with the approval of gentlemen of this House, both in its numerous preambles and in the body of the resolution itself.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TOWNER. I have only five minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say that so far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for the members of the committee, the reason we voted against amending the McLemore resolution so as to put it in more artistic form was because the McLemore resolution has become known abroad, and some foreign capital might say that the McLemore resolution was torn to pieces, and that the President of the United States was not indorsed.

Mr. TOWNER. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I am very much afraid that the gentleman is acting upon the suggestion of somebody else rather than upon his own judgment.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, I am not.

Mr. TOWNER. I will submit to the gentleman that I do not know upon what ground he is acting. However, Mr. Chairman, I think I am justified in saying that there is no man on the floor of this House who has examined the McLemore resolution—unless it is the author himself—who would approve of it. Yet, Mr. Chairman, there is in that resolution a sentiment and an idea that has gone abroad throughout the country as the McLemore resolution, which sentiment gentlemen in this House do approve. I am not qualified to speak for others, but, Mr. Chairman, from what I know of the opinion on both sides of this House there is a very general opinion among the Members that we ought to warn American citizens not to travel on armed merchant belligerent vessels. And that is the view of the people of the country. But if now we are going to have this McLemore resolution presented to us, we must believe that it is presented in its present form because some gentlemen who desire to have it voted down believe there are things in it that will cause men to vote against it who would not vote against the principal idea for which it stands and by which it is known. Now, that is just what we ought not to allow. It is as much the duty of gentlemen on the other side of the House as it is our duty to see that this question, if it is to be decided by the House at all, shall be decided fairly and squarely upon the only vital question which it stands for, and that these extraneous matters ought not to be allowed to become reasons why gentlemen may justify themselves in voting to table it and put it out of the way. So I say that these assertions that are made here, that we must stand or fall by the McLemore resolution without any amendment, are made, in my judgment, for the purpose of discrediting it if possible in the view of some gentlemen. As it stands some Members will doubtless vote to table the resolution, not because they believe or do not believe in its vital principle, but because of some extraneous matter, and that ought not to be allowed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPWOOD].

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I feel that the President has put up to us a question that he had no right to put up to us to begin with. It was not a question of such magnitude and importance as to demand solution by anyone except himself; and when he did put it up to this House, he ought to have put it up to us in a very different way. He ought to have sent to Congress what information he had and what correspondence he had, and to have given us such information as would have enabled us to act intelligently in regard to all the circumstances of the case. That is the way the President has put it up to Congress before. In the War of 1812 and for five or six years prior thereto Jefferson and Madison put questions up to Congress time after time, about the insults to our flag, and about the impressment of our seamen, and about the killing of men on our vessels, and other matters of that kind, but they never put them up to Congress without presenting to Congress all the information they had in regard to the matters at issue.

So I say the President has been unfortunate in putting this up to us in this way. I yield to no man in my loyalty to the Government, but I do not yield to the President of the United States or to anybody else my judgment. I think the Members of Congress have as much right to their judgment, and that they represent the people of the country perhaps as much as the President does, in the capacity in which they are sent here.

The President was also very unfortunate in his speech that he made to the club the other night, when he said he would rather hear from the people at their firesides than from Congress in the cloakrooms. About 435 of us here represent firesides ourselves. Each of us represents probably 250,000 people on an average—that is about the number in my district—and there are a good many firesides in each district. I visit a great many of the firesides of my district when I am at home, and I know the people intimately who live there, because I have lived there 59 years. So I have known many of them, and I know many of their firesides. The President can not know as many firesides as 435 Members of this House can know. So I think he was very unfortunate in making that declaration.

The President wants a vote of confidence here. What does he want? It is pretty hard to tell just what he wants. At first he wanted this resolution kept in committee, and now he wants it out of the committee. Well, it is out, and I am willing to vote on the square on that resolution or any other resolution; and my theory is that this country will never go to war and our people back home will never allow us to vote to go to war upon any foolish right of some foolhardy people traveling on these armed vessels. I do not care whether you call them war vessels or what you call them, they are armed with heavy guns, at least, and they can shoot a long distance, and the submarine, which is a new instrument of warfare, can not hope to cope with them in the open.

So if the submarine is any good in this war it has to do its work in the way it is doing it. I am not saying that laws are to be changed during the time of war, but I do say that this instrument of warfare is to be used in a different way from any other instrument, and the old rules and precedents do not apply. Laws are changed. International laws are not settled things. Who knows what international law is? It is changed with the years just as the common law has changed in centuries from the beginning or the inception of the common law down to this minute. The courts have ruled and ruled, and under new conditions and the common law changes. Under new conditions international agreements and international law has changed. So I say that this House ought never to vote for such a doubtful and nonessential right as they are claiming, and if Americans insist on traveling on armed vessels it should not make it a cause of war if that vessel be sunk. I will never go to war, nor will I allow my three sturdy sons, sturdier and stronger that I am, to go to war because some foolhardy person goes upon a vessel and loses his life.

I am free to vote on the question, however it may come up. I am not acquainted with the rules of the House. As soon as I learn one a new one comes up that I had not found out, and it will be a good while before I do know about them. [Laughter.] I do not know yet just how this question will come up; but what I do know is that if I can find out the question I know how I want to vote on it, and when I do vote I am going to vote against Americans traveling on armed vessels and bringing us into war by their foolishness. [Applause.]

I referred to the fact of Jefferson and Madison presenting important questions to Congress in the stormy times just prior to the War of 1812, when the conditions of the world were much the same as they are now. I desire to read two messages, one from Jefferson and one from Madison, to supplement my argument that our President in presenting this matter might have followed the precedents established by them and presented to Congress all the correspondence and information in his possession for the guidance of Congress in determining their action in this matter. Secret diplomacy is not popular in America, and should never be.

Message of Thomas Jefferson to Congress, dated March 22, 1808:

> Although I have heretofore and from time to time made such communications to Congress as to keep them possessed of a general and just view of the proceedings and dispositions of the Government of France toward this country, yet in our present critical situation, when we find that no conduct on our part, however impartial and friendly, has been sufficient to insure from either belligerent a just respect for our rights, I am desirous that nothing shall be omitted on my part which may add to your information on this subject or contribute to the correctness of the views which should be formed. The papers which for these reasons I now lay before you embrace all the communications, official or verbal, from the French Government respecting the general relations between the two countries which have been transmitted through our minister there or through any other accredited channel since the last session of Congress.

France had, on December 17, 1807, promulgated a decree which, in the words of Jefferson—> amounted to a declaration that every neutral vessel found on the high seas, whatsoever be her cargo, and whatsoever foreign port be that of her departure or destination, shall be deemed lawful prize.

Message of James Madison, June 1, 1812:

> I communicate to Congress certain documents, being a continuation of those heretofore laid before them on the subject of our affairs with Great Britain. Without going back beyond the renewal in 1803 of the war in which Great Britain is engaged, and omitting unrepaired wrongs of inferior magnitude, the conduct of her Government presents a series of acts hostile to the United States as an independent and neutral nation, * * * violating the American flag on the great highway of nations, * * * seizing and carrying off persons sailing under it. * * * Thousands of American citizens, under the safeguard of public law and of their national flag, have been torn from their country and everything dear to them; have been dragged on board ships of war of a foreign nation and exposed under the severities of their discipline to be exiled to the most distant and deadly climes, to risk their lives in the battles of their oppressors.
> British cruisers have also violated the rights and the peace of our coasts. They hover over and harrass our entering and departing commerce. To the most insulting pretensions they have added the most lawless proceedings in our very harbors and have wantonly spilt American blood within the sanctuary of our territorial jurisdiction. * * * When called upon to punish those who committed these offenses her Government has bestowed on their commanders additional marks of honor and confidence.
> * * * Our commerce has been plundered in every sea, the great staples of our country have been cut off from their legitimate markets, and a destructive blow aimed at our agricultural and maritime interests. * * * We behold, in fine, on the side of Great Britain a state of war against the United States and on the side of the United States a state of peace toward Great Britain. * * *
> Whether the United States shall remain passive under these progressive usurpations and these accumulating wrongs, or opposing, force to force, in defense of their national rights, shall commit a just cause into the hands of the Almighty Disposer of events, is a solemn question which the Constitution wisely confides to the legislative department of the Government. In recommending it to their early deliberations I am happy in the assurance that the decision will be worthy the enlightened and patriotic counsels of a virtuous, a free, and a powerful nation.

On June 18, 1812, Congress declared that war existed between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof and the United States of America and their Territories.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with very much interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] upon this very grave and important question. It seemed to me that the force of the argument contained in their remarks was that any Member of Congress who opposed the tabling of the McLemore resolution was unpatriotic. Now, I do not believe that all the patriotism in this country lies with the gentleman from Virginia or with the gentleman from Kentucky or altogether with the gentlemen on that side of the House. Nor do I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in this Nation the sum total of patriotism and love of country lies alone with the President of the United States. We have here a very simple question to meet. The President has seen fit to ask the membership of this House their judgment on a very plain question, on the question as to whether the membership of this House desires to have him warn Americans not to travel upon armed ships of belligerents.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. If we vote to table the resolution, would that advise the President of our attitude on the question?

Mr. NORTON. I must say to the gentleman that I do not think it would. A vote to table the resolution the way the resolution is going to be presented to the House, or at least the way certain Members of the House are going to try to have it presented to the House, certainly would not inform anyone of the real attitude of the House on the question at issue. I trust that the House will vote to-morrow against the rule that is to be offered and that the House will vote to-morrow instead to put the McLemore resolution before the House so that it can be amended and so that a full and free opportunity will be given to vote squarely on the question to warn or not to warn American citizens to refrain from traveling on armed vessels of belligerents during the continuance of this terrible world war.

To no man do I yield in the love and veneration which I bear for my country. I feel fully as patriotic and fully as zealous for the honor of my country and for the welfare of its people as any man who has spoken here to-day or as the President of the United States can feel. When the President asks me as a Member of the Congress for my judgment on any question presented to the Congress, I am going to give him that judgment freely, frankly, and honestly. I am not going to endeavor to dodge behind some technicality of parliamentary procedure. I am not going to change any honest opinion I may have on the question merely to be in accord with the views the President may entertain. The President should not expect Members of Congress to do this. No man is worthy of being a Member of this great forum who is so puerile, weak, and suppliant as to yield in a question of this character and in times like these his honest opinions and convictions to any mere whim or dictum of the President.

This question fairly presented does not involve a question of restricting, denying, or repudiating any of the authority or powers any President of these United States has had in the past or rightfully and properly has to-day. The President's opinion and conclusion on this question is not the only opinion and conclusion that should have weight in determining the right policy to be pursued. A few nights ago the President said, in addressing a banquet in this city, that he wanted more to hear from the firesides of the country than from the halls of Congress. If to-morrow a proper procedure is adopted, and he hears squarely and honestly from this House on this question, he will have heard from the firesides of the country. The firesides of the country—of the East and of the West, of the North and of the South—to-day, by an almost unanimous voice, are in favor of urging and warning all American citizens to refrain from traveling upon armed vessels of belligerents during the continuance of this world war.

Not one good reason has been advanced why such warning should not be issued. None can be advanced. In this debate other questions than the real one at issue can be raised and have been raised. Arguments based on these questions are beside the real issue as to whether American citizens should or should not be warned and urged to keep off of armed vessels of belligerents during this war, and are arguments that have no proper place in this debate.

I have wondered how much the desire and influence of the powerful banking, manufacturing, and shipping corporations of this country that are carrying on a superlatively profitable trade with the allies to-day is responsible for the newspaper expressions and sentiment in opposition to a direct and decisive vote on this question by the Congress. I have wondered if the sentiment in some quarters against the adoption of the proposed resolution arises so much from a spirit of national honor and patriotism as from a spirit of private gain and profit.

Why was it right a short time ago to warn Americans not only to keep out but to get out of Mexico, and why is it now weak and dishonorable to warn Americans to keep off of armed vessels of belligerents? Do we hold that Sweden has been weak and dishonorable in warning her citizens to keep off of armed vessels of belligerents during this war? I think not. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand how a Member of this House, especially a Republican Member, can criticize the President of the United States for warning people out of Mexico instead of protecting them and then in the same breath turn around and ask him to warn Americans off belligerent ships on the high seas. It seems to me that that is the apex of idiotic inconsistency. [Laughter.] And several Republicans have made speeches of that kind. Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of the rights of some blatant fool from New York or Brooklyn who says when he gets aboard a ship that he enjoys the "thrills" of going through the war zone. It is not a question of that kind at all. That sort of braggart would not travel on a ship where there were not a lot of other Americans where he would feel well protected. It is not a question primarily of trans-Atlantic travel. There are American men and women all over the world, many of them missionaries or engaged in errands of mercy or engaged in business, in building up American trade. They must travel sometimes, and they are compelled to travel on such ships as they can find. I was talking with old Gen. Prime down here in the House restaurant the other day. He said he had a daughter in Syria; that she could not get out of there; and that he only heard from her occasionally, and then the censor cut off the letter just as she got to the most interesting part when she tried to say something. Mr. Chairman, in every country there are Americans, men and women, in missionary work or in business, who want to come home here to America. Suppose they are in South Africa or in China or in India? They will have to go to London and will have to travel on such ships as are bound for England. Now, some of these ships may carry a 6-inch gun or a machine gun of some kind, may be armed for defense. Are we going to serve notice on a foreign nation which is using submarines against merchant ships that she can torpedo any of those ships on sight, without warning? Are we going to serve notice that we do not propose to protect our American citizens if traveling upon such ships? We have not any ships of our own upon which they can travel. If we are going to stop them entirely from traveling, if we are going to be so cowardly as to say in advance that we are not going to give them any protection, I for one feel as though I would like to renounce my American citizenship. I do not like to belong to a country of such cowards. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if this were not serious, it would seem to me like an opéra bouffe. On Saturday the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported the McLemore resolution with the recommendation that it lie on the table. That is the usual form of an adverse report upon a bill, and, under the rules of the House, thereupon it was laid on the table. Nobody who favored the resolution asked to have it placed on the calendar, as was in order under the rules within three days; but, unfortunately, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Foss], who, I understand, is opposed to the resolution, this morning asked to have it placed on the calendar. Being on the calendar, there is no way under the rules of the House, under our procedure, by which it can be reached for consideration. On Saturday it was on the table. This morning it was lifted from the table under the rules and placed on the calendar, hanging in the air, where nobody can reach it. To-morrow the Committee on Rules proposes to bring in a rule under which any gentleman will have priority and right of recognition to move to lay it back on the table, where it was Saturday and this morning. For Heaven's sake, how does that method of procedure settle any grave international complication? [Applause.] It is a silly procedure. Those who favored laying the resolution on the table are going to vote that way to-morrow. Why do they not leave it on the table to-day? They say they want a vote of the House. It will be no more tightly attached to the table if the House tables it than it was when the committee tabled it under the rules; but if gentlemen are on the square, if they really want to know the opinion of the House, then there ought to be an opportunity to amend the resolution so as to express the opinion of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I would if my time were not expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there left?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has been exhausted. The gentleman from Colorado has three minutes remaining.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt a detailed discussion of this important question, but, as an advocate of peace, will discuss what the McLemore resolution proposes and its effects. If the President did not already have in hand the delicate foreign diplomatic issues touched upon by this resolution, it would, to a great extent, present a different case, but we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. It is a matter upon which there is an honest difference of opinion. Others who are sincere are entitled to their opinions, and I, equally as sincere, am entitled to mine. Some one is mistaken in the correctness of their views, and, of course, I think the gentlemen of a contrary idea to mine are mistaken. There is no need for feeling. We are all Americans and interested in the welfare and glory of our great common country. I agree that Americans should stay off armed merchantmen flying belligerent flags and should do all in their power not to involve us, but the handling of the matter should be left with the President.

What does this resolution propose? It proposes to take from the executive branch of our Government the right and duty to handle questions affecting our foreign relations. Its result would be an insult to the President and a direct repudiation of him in all questions relating to our foreign policies. Whether so intended or not, it would operate along this line, and, if passed, will not only humiliate our President and the Nation in every country of the world, but will lead us into complications that unquestionably mean war. The President is earnestly seeking to avoid war. The country does not want war.

In this I am with the President, and hope he will be permitted, without handicap or interference, to work out this situation to the end that war will be averted and our national honor preserved. International law is our only safeguard against war, and the consequences will unquestionably be serious if we interfere at this time with the President, whose work is in the interest of "peace with honor."

Since the birth of our Republic, which gave liberty a new and hopeful meaning to all mankind, it has been the unquestioned right and duty of the executive branch of our Government to deal with and manage the delicate questions affecting our foreign affairs and relations. Our forefathers, who christened this young Republic with their blood that liberty might live and that America's honor might rise above expediency and cowardice, saw the wisdom of leaving these intricate foreign questions to the President, and all these years it has been the law and the custom.

Why the change at this time? Why should Congress come in and do that which the President now has the right to do if he considers it wise that it should be done? The custom that has obtained since the birth of our Nation has proven satisfactory, and, whether under Republican or Democratic administrations, the ship of state has been, to this good hour, wisely guided in foreign issues and kept off the rocks of ruin. To make a change in the custom of handling our foreign affairs in this serious crisis would engulf and embroil us in war in a short time. To adopt this resolution would mean to surrender American rights and forfeit our national self-respect. No man respects another who has no respect for himself, and the same is true with nations.

This country has been neutral, and properly so, during the awful war that has raged like the fury of an inferno in Europe. Ours is comparatively a new country, and our citizenship is made up of blood from nearly all the other nations of the world.

President Wilson has thus far handled, with the hand of a master and the wisdom of a sage, the hundreds of confusing and complexing questions that have arisen since the European war began, and he has had one great aim, "peace with honor." Who can ask for less? In this war we have "played no favorites," but have sought to keep out of the conflict, and the only hope for success in this regard is to firmly demand a strict observance by all countries of the rules of international law. To do less is to "give up the ship" and run up the white flag of surrender in the most serious crisis and the greatest hour of need that has confronted this country in half a century.

Unwise and unjust comment, through the press and otherwise, has sought to arouse suspicion and prejudices against those American citizens of the German blood. For one I resent this on the part of those people. Such suspicions are not well founded and do a grave injustice to millions of true Americans. A small percentage of German blood courses through my veins, and in the district I have the honor to represent are hundreds of people of German blood, and there are no truer Americans than those people. They, like our great President, even in a conflict with Germany, are for "America first," and in the unfortunate and regrettable event of war with Germany, or any other country, would be found, to a man, fighting for the Stars and Stripes.

In this connection I wish to call to the attention of Congress and the country the fact that no section of the country has stood more loyally by the President in this crisis for the preservation of our national honor, respect, and liberties than have the Representatives and Senators from the South. I mention this in answer to slanderous insinuations that have been made in certain quarters that the South could not be depended upon in a crisis. No section of our great common country will ever contribute, proportionately, more of its men and means for the preservation of America and its free institutions than has and will the South.

This, my friends, is not a partisan question. We should rise above parties and sections on this occasion like the sun rises above a settling fog, and high above party or personal interest we should be actuated only by patriotic motives and vote for our country and its welfare.

No greater man has been President of these United States since Jefferson's time than Woodrow Wilson—a peace advocate, wise, patriotic, patient, liberty-loving, God-fearing, and a slave in the performance of his duties. He has borne great burdens for months, sustained and encouraged by the sympathies and prayers of millions of loyal Americans that he might continue to pilot our Nation in the waters of peace, and now, like a bolt from a clear sky, comes this resolution to discredit and humiliate him. The American people will countenance nothing of the kind, and to-day millions of Americans are praying that Congress will act wisely and bravely in sustaining our customs and laws in order that Congress will not take these functions from the Executive.

To pass this resolution is to upset old and valuable customs and bring ridicule and shame upon our country and possibly shed the innocent blood of her sons in a useless and preventable war. May God guide us in our deliberations as He has guided our fathers in perils that confronted them in days gone by, and may He, in His wisdom and goodness, keep us in the paths of peace, that our country might lead other nations and other people into a higher and nobler civilization, and that we might yet be of aid in bringing peace to the bleeding and tottering countries of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. If we succeed to-morrow in taking up this resolution and laying it on the table, can any Member then call it up again and put it upon the calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and does not care to pass upon such a parliamentary question.

Mr. MANN. Anyone can reintroduce it.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois has already said that the McLemore resolution was as tightly nailed to the table as it could be.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find that there are methods by which it can be brought up again.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the debate closed and proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to consume the remaining time that he has?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any qualified person who has heretofore or shall hereafter in good faith make settlement upon and improve unsurveyed unreserved unappropriated public lands of the United States with intention, upon survey, of entering same under the homestead laws shall be entitled to a continuous leave of absence from the land settled upon by him for a period not exceeding seven months in each year after establishment of residence: Provided, That he shall have plainly marked on the ground the exterior boundaries of the lands claimed and have filed in the local land office notice of the approximate location of the lands settled upon and claimed, of the period of intended absence, and that he shall upon the termination of the absence and his return to the land file notice thereof in the local land office.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, lines 7, 8, and 9, strike out the words "continuous leave of absence from the lands settled upon by him for a period not exceeding seven" and insert the language "leave of absence in one or two continuous periods not exceeding in the aggregate five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill—H. R. 9691—for the relief of a large number of settlers upon the unsurveyed public domain of the West. The act of Congress of May 4, 1880, Twenty-first Statutes, page 140, reads as follows:

RIGHTS OF SETTLERS.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

* * * * * * *

SEC. 3. That any settler who has settled, or who shall hereafter settle, on any of the public lands of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the intention of claiming the same under the homestead laws, shall be allowed the same time to file his homestead application and perfect his original entry in the United States Land Office as is now allowed to settlers under the preemption laws to put their claims on record, and his right shall relate back to the date of settlement the same as if he settled under the preemption laws.

Approved, May 14, 1880. (21 Stat., 140.)

Ever since the passage of that act the rights of homestead settlers upon unsurveyed public lands have been recognized as equally legitimate with those of settlers upon surveyed lands. But there never has been any system of protecting those rights, and during the 35 years since that law was enacted whenever a settler went away from his claim, even to obtain necessary work to support himself and family, or whenever he left his home for the purpose of educating his children, or on account of illness, or for any other necessary purpose, he thereby jeopardized his right to hold the place. The justice of a bill allowing him the same right to leave of absence that the settlers upon surveyed lands have has never been questioned and never can be questioned by anybody. But, strange to say, Congress has never enacted any law to specifically recognize and protect that right.

A bill of this kind was passed by the Senate in the last Congress and it was favorably reported to the House by the Public Lands Committee, of which I am a member, but owing to the large volume of business ahead of it it was never acted upon by the House. This bill was submitted for report to the Interior

Department, and Secretary Lane has made the following report upon it to the chairman of my committee:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 1, 1916.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your request for a report on H. R. 9691, to grant an absence privilege during each year to homestead settlers upon the unsurveyed public lands. The bill is identical in its provisions with S. 2316, Sixty-third Congress, as reported to the House of Representatives by your committee March 20, 1914, except that the maximum absence is now fixed at seven months instead of five.

We had recommended passage of S. 2316, and the committee's amendment was made at the suggestion of the Department of Agriculture, in order to remove ambiguity which might have resulted to the detriment of the public interests in the national forests. I repeat here the reasons for my recommendation of the enactment, set forth in my report on S. 2316.

By section 3 of the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140), settlers upon unsurveyed public lands are allowed a preference right to make entry for the tracts claimed by them within three months after the filing of the plats of survey; their rights relate back to the time of settlement, and they are, consequently, on submission of final proof, allowed credit for residence and cultivation had before the dates of their entries. In a general way these settlers are required to keep up a substantially continuous residence in order to maintain their preference right of entry and in order to entitle themselves to credit for compliance with the homestead laws prior to the dates of their entries. However, there is no statute law as to the extent to which they may absent themselves without forfeiting their preference rights, nor is there such a law to allow them to absent themselves without forfeiting their credit for residence.

As stated, the law expressly grants these settlers the right to initiate their homestead claims by settlement, and no good reason appears why they should not be allowed the same periods of absence from the land as are, by the three-year act of June 6, 1912 (37 Stat., 123), allowed to persons who have actually placed their entries of record.

However, no reason exists why the settlers should be accorded the privilege of longer absence than is granted persons who have made entries, and the homestead law does not allow credit for a year's residence unless there has been actual stay upon the land for at least seven months thereof. Therefore the word "seven" (relating to absences) should be changed to "five."

On the other hand, the act of August 22, 1914 (38 Stat., 704), permits the entrymen to divide the allowable absences in each year into two periods; and I see no reason why the same privilege should not be given to settlers on unsurveyed land. Therefore I recommend the enactment of the bill, provided the allowable absence be limited to five months, but that it be amended before its enactment by striking out "continuous" in line 7, all of line 8, and "period not exceeding seven" in line 9, page 1, and inserting in lieu thereof "leave of absence in one or two continuous periods not exceeding in the aggregate five."

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN LANE, Secretary.

In order to give the House some idea of the importance of this measure and of the extent of territory to which it will apply, I will insert a table taken from the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing the amount of unsurveyed land in the various States and the Territory of Alaska at the present time, from which it will be shown that there are over 600,000,000 acres of remaining unsurveyed lands. The table is as follows:

In Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, and Wisconsin the lands surveyed were not regarded as public when the surrounding lands were originally surveyed.

There are in every State in the Union, where there is any appreciable quantity of unsurveyed land, a large number of homestead settlers who have been living upon their lands for a great many years without being able to obtain title thereto, because of the Government being unable to extend the survey to such lands. It was shown before our committee, and I personally know of instances, where men have been living on land for 25 years without being able to induce the Government officials to survey their claims. These settlers have been extended authority under the act of Congress above quoted, which law is still in full force, to settle upon these unsurveyed lands and initiate a preference right thereto. But there is no law or authority that allows them the five months leave of absence that is allowed to all other homestead settlers every year upon surveyed land, nor is there any proceeding whereby he can obtain any leave of absence without jeopardizing his rights.

Moreover, after a homestead entryman on surveyed land has resided upon his claim for three years and complied with the law in relation to cultivation, he is given permission to remove from his claim, if he so desires, or if it becomes necessary for his business, or to support or educate his family, while no such privilege has ever been granted to the settlers on unsurveyed lands at any time. Many of them will have to continue residence upon their lands, even under this proposed legislation, for probably many more years in the future, waiting the Government survey before they can obtain any leave of absence, or safely remain away from their land for any period exceeding the five months in any one year, notwithstanding they may have complied with all the requirements of the law as to residence two or three times over.

The amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior and adopted by your committee is in conformity with the act of August 22, 1914 (38 Stat., 704). The settler upon surveyed land knows when he can make final proof, while the settler upon unsurveyed land has no assurance as to when, if ever, he can make final proof, and there certainly is no reason now, and never has been during the past 35 years that that law has been on the statute books allowing settlement upon unsurveyed lands, for requiring any stricter rule as to continuous residence than is required of settlers upon surveyed lands.

The bill as recommended by the Public Lands Committee, and as now adopted by the House, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any qualified person who has heretofore or shall hereafter in good faith make settlement upon and improve unsurveyed unreserved unappropriated public lands of the United States with intention, upon survey, of entering same under the homestead laws shall be entitled to a leave of absence in one or two continuous periods not exceeding in the aggregate five months in each year after establishment of residence: Provided, That he shall have plainly marked on the ground the exterior boundaries of the lands claimed and have filed in the local land office notice of the approximate location of the lands settled upon and claimed, of the period of intended absence, and that he shall upon the termination of the absence and his return to the land file notice thereof in the local land office.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment, which I am authorized by the Public Lands Committee to present to the House for its consideration. This amendment is to afford the settlers upon unsurveyed land the same relief that is given a settler upon surveyed land after he has fully complied with the law in relation to three years' residence and cultivation, which amendment I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "office," insert:

"Provided further, That after the expiration of three years' residence upon and improvement of the land as provided by law the entryman may submit to the local land office proof of such residence and improvement, including a description of such land, which proof shall be corroborated by the sworn statement of the entryman supported by the verified statements of two disinterested witnesses, and thereafter such entryman shall not be required to maintain residence upon such land, but shall be required to continue the improvement and cultivation thereof and make final proof thereon as required by law within one year after said land is surveyed."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. I do not know what it is, but evidently it has no place here. Is this a new proposition entirely?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, no; this is not a new proposition.

Mr. MANN. Is this a substitute for the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. It is an amendment offered at the end of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that having obtained unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill he is going to tack on another proposition, because if that is the case there will be no more of these bills considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that if this is not a proper amendment, why, I, of course, do not at all want to jeopardize the bill by offering it.

By way of explanation I want to say that after the committee had reported the bill in this form a number of the members of the committee from the West, and I will say several Members from that side of the House also, suggested that we really ought to allow settlers who have complied with all the requirements of the homestead law as to three years' residence and cultivation and improvement on the public domain in places where the Government has not yet extended a survey to that land. There are people living on unsurveyed lands in the West up creeks, in gulches, and isolated places, where they have been living for many years waiting for the Government to extend the official surveys to their land, and they can not prove up on them until the survey is extended to their land.

The Government does not feel justified in extending the surveys and expending a large sum of money for the purpose of accommodating only a few, and, in some cases, only one or two settlers. The result is that these men are compelled to live there indefinitely. They can not safely go away to obtain work or educate their children or for any other purpose, and it is for the purpose of according to those settlers on the unsurveyed public domain, who are bona fide settlers, to give to them identically the same rights that the man has on surveyed land. That is all.

Mr. MANN. That is the original bill; what has that got to do with the amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is this amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is the original bill; here is the original bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I know what the original bill was, but this amendment does what I say, it allows a leave of absence after final proof. The bill as now approved allows a leave of absence before final proof.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; but the gentleman is describing the original bill and I am talking about this amendment. What the gentleman states applies to the original bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the gentleman from Illinois misunderstands me. Under existing law when a man proves up on a homestead claim on surveyed land and complies with the law he has the right to leave that homestead claim, if he wants to, and go where he pleases. This amendment gives to the settler on unsurveyed land who has proved his three years' residence and cultivation the same right. Of course if there is any serious objection to this amendment I do not insist upon it, as I do not want to jeopardize the bill. The bill without this amendment will be of very great benefit throughout the West. There are nearly 3,000,000 acres of unsurveyed lands in Colorado, and there are hundreds of people living on those lands.

Mr. MANN. I do not think where we hear a long amendment read like this, which we do not understand, and dealing with a technical subject like this——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the ranking minority member of our committee, has a copy of the amendment there.

Mr. MANN. He may have; I do not know when he got it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He has got it and knows what it is, and many other members—in fact, all the members of the Public Lands Committee—fully understand this amendment.

Mr. MANN. I say I do not know when he got it. However, that would not make any difference——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I had this amendment ready to present two weeks ago to-day, at the last call of this calendar, but we did not reach the bill at that time. Since then I brought the matter up before the full committee, and, after consideration, I was formally authorized to present this amendment at this time as a committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the Members of the House ought to have a chance to understand this bill? This bill was up in the last Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly; I thought this matter was understood. It was passed by the Senate and is a very simple and plain matter.

Mr. MANN. As a Senate bill; it was passed in the Senate. It was reported to the House, but not passed by the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. It was never formally considered by the House, but the Public Lands Committee of the last Congress favorably reported the bill.

Mr. MANN. And it was introduced again in this House as a House bill. Now at the last minute the gentleman discovers that he wants a long lot of other stuff in the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is not a long lot of other stuff; it is a short and plain amendment that every Member from the West wants to have go in the bill, and every one of them will tell the gentleman that is right.

Mr. MANN. That is all right as to Members from the West, but this is not the first time they all wanted something I thought ought not to be granted.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is really to accord to settlers on unsurveyed land the same privileges that are now enjoyed by settlers on surveyed land.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve it if the gentleman desires me to do so, but only for a few minutes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. If the gentleman will look, he will see that the same provisions are sought to be given to the entryman on unsurveyed land, and none other, that are to-day accorded to settlers on surveyed land. A man on surveyed land takes a homestead. He may prove it up in three years and get a title. He may reserve that proof for five years, but at the end of three years he is not required to live there. Now, this amendment simply gives the same privilege to entrymen on unsurveyed land as to the settlers on surveyed land, and they are entitled to it. That is the full purport of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment is subject to the point of order. It goes way beyond the subject matter of this bill and provides, as I understand, methods in regard to proof of homestead entry, and so forth, which is not the subject matter of this bill at all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, let the Chairman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment that was adopted by the Committee of the Whole, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MURRAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9691, and directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JUDGMENTS AND DECREES, UNITED STATES COURTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11416) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States,' approved August 1, 1888."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11416) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States,' approved August 1, 1888."

Be it enacted, etc., That an act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States,' approved August 1 1888," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect on and after January 1, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DUPRÉ, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEND OREILLE RIVER, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8248) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, Wash.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the present consideration of the bill S. 3144, it being the same as the House bill.

Mr. MANN. I object. We should first consider the House bill, the Senate bill being the next one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill H. R. 8248?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. MANN. The House bill ought to lie on the table.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay it on the table, and ask that we take up the bill S. 3144.

Mr. MANN. Dispose of the next bill, and then we will go back to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3144) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Pend Oreille County, in the State of Washington, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pend Oreille River at any point suitable to the interests of navigation, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the county of Pend Oreille, in the State of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That Pend Oreille County, State of Washington, and the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, Pend Oreille County, Wash., their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized, jointly or separately, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pend Oreille River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between said towns, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DILLON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill H. R. 8248 be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVERSE CITIZENSHIP IN FEDERAL COURTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8028) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill relating to the jurisdiction of the United States courts, and I think there ought to be some explanation as to its real purpose before the bill is taken up for jurisdiction as to just what it accomplishes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, all the new law that is contained in this bill is in the last proviso, beginning in line 23, on page 4, and which reads:

And provided further, That no suit against a corporation or a joint-stock company brought in a State court of the State in which the cause of action arose shall be removed to any court of the United States on the ground that the parties are citizens of different States if the suit is brought in the county where the cause of action arose or within the county where the defendant is served with process and the plaintiff resides.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, it is purposed that in any suit brought in the local court where the plaintiff can obtain jurisdiction on a nonresident defendant or on an official of a corporation that has its citizenship in another State. In that instance it can not be removed to the United States court on the ground of diverse citizenship.

Mr. GARRETT. That is the purpose. That a foreign corporation, where service can be had as indicated by the bill, shall not be permitted to remove simply on the ground of diverse citizenship. It does not take away any other right of removal under the general statute.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the report it is stated that this amendment will not prevent the defendant setting up the ground of prejudice of the trial court—of the initial court?

Mr. GARRETT. It is not designed to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the limitation that will extend that privilege to the defendant?

Mr. GARRETT. The general law carries it. It is not in this particular section, but in another section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 28 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 28. That any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, of which the district courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by this title, which may now be pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the district court of the United States for the proper district. Any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by this title, and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed into the district court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein being nonresidents of that State. And when, in any suit mentioned in this section, there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the district court of the United States for the proper district. And where a suit is now pending or may hereafter be brought in any State court in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, any defendant being such citizen of another State may remove such suit into the district court of the United States for the proper district at any time before the trial thereof when it shall be made to appear to said district court that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court, or in any other State court to which the said defendant may, under the laws of the State, have the right, on account of such prejudice or local influence, to remove said cause: Provided, That if it further appear that said suit can be fully and justly determined as to the other defendants in the State court without being affected by such prejudice or local influence, and that no party to the suit will be prejudiced by a separation of the parties, said district court may direct the suit to be remanded, so far as relates to such other defendants, to the State court to be proceeded with therein. At any time before the trial of any suit which is now pending in any district court, or may hereafter be entered therein, and which has been removed to said court from a State court on the affidavit of any party plaintiff that he had reason to believe and did believe that from prejudice or local influence he was unable to obtain justice in said State court, the district court shall, on application of the other party, examine into the truth of said affidavit and the grounds thereof and, unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of said court that said party will not be able to obtain justice in said State court, it shall cause the same to be remanded thereto. Whenever any cause shall be removed from any State court into any district court of the United States and the district court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed and order the same to be remanded to the State court from whence it came, such remand shall be immediately carried into execution, and no appeal or writ of error from the decision of the district court so remanding such cause shall be allowed: Provided further, That no case arising under an act entitled 'An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases,' approved April 22, 1908, or any amendment thereto, and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States: Provided further, That no suit brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction against a railroad company, or other corporation, or person, engaged in and carrying on the business of a common carrier, to recover damages for delay, loss of, or injury to property received for transportation by such common carrier under section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended June 29, 1906, April 13, 1908, February 25, 1909, and June 18, 1910, shall be removed to any court of the United States where the matter in controversy does not exceed, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $3,000: And provided further, That no suit against a corporation or joint-stock company brought in a State court of the State in which the cause of action arose shall be removed to any court of the United States on the ground that the parties are citizens of different States if the suit is brought in the county where the cause of action arose or within the county where the defendant is served with process and the plaintiff resides."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARRETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

PUBLIC PARK, COLUMBIA RIVER GORGE, NEAR PORTLAND, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4746) granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., for a public park, a tract of land within a Government reserve.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the Interior Department has heretofore withdrawn from sale the hereinafter-described tract for the purpose of protecting the waters of Multnomah Creek, forming Multnomah Falls, in the State of Oregon; and

Whereas the city of Portland, Oreg., has acquired said Multnomah Falls and surrounding lands adjoining said tract for a public park, and can better conserve and improve said tract along with said park: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the city of Portland, Oreg., the northeast quarter and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 18, township 1 north, of range 6 east, of the Willamette meridian, Oregon, for public park purposes, and a patent for same is hereby authorized to be issued by the proper officers to said city of Portland.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend by striking out the preamble and also striking out line 4, page 1, and lines 1 to 3, inclusive, and the words "by the proper officers to said city of Portland," on line 4, page 2, and inserting the following: "the right to purchase the northeast quarter and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 18, in township 1 north of range 6 east of the Willamette meridian, Oregon, for public park purposes, and the same are hereby conveyed to the city of Portland, Oreg., upon payment of $1.25 per acre by the said city to the United States: Provided, That the lands hereby authorized to be purchased as hereinbefore set forth shall be held and used by or for the said grantee for the purposes herein specified, and in the event the said lands shall cease to be so used they shall revert to the United States, and this condition shall be expressed in the patent to be issued under the terms of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report. This is an amendment to the amendment of the preamble?

Mr. MANN. No. That is to be stricken out, but that is after the bill passes. This is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the committee amendment the words "and the same are hereby conveyed to the city of Portland, Oreg.," and insert "and a patent for the same is hereby authorized to be issued by the proper officers to the said city of Portland, Oreg."

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR] does not want to convey it by this act, because they may never do it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment to strike out the preamble.

The committee amendment to strike out the preamble was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. McARTHUR, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

FORT M'HENRY MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 68) to cede to the State of Maryland temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Fort McHenry Military Reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of War is authorized by an act of May 26, 1914 (Public, No. 108, 63d Cong.), to grant to the city of Baltimore permission to use a certain portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation as a public park; and

Whereas the Secretary of War, under the authority in him vested by the said act, did, by an instrument dated June 1, 1914, grant permission to the said city to use said portion of the said military reservation for the said purpose; and

Whereas the United States now has exclusive jurisdiction over the said military reservation; and

Whereas it is desirable that the power to preserve order on the said portion of the said reservation during its use by the city of Baltimore be vested in the authorities of the State of Maryland: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the United States hereby cedes to the State of Maryland such jurisdiction over the said portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation as the State now possesses elsewhere within its territory, such cession to be coextensive territorially with the said permit of June 1, 1914, and to terminate upon its expiration: Provided, That jurisdiction to try and punish all crimes committed within said portion of the military reservation prior to the date that this cession becomes effective is reserved to the United States: Provided further, That the cession of jurisdiction made by this resolution shall not take effect until the same is accepted by the Legislature of the State of Maryland or its duly appointed representative clothed with such authority: And provided further, That when the United States shall resume possession of the said lands, or any part thereof, the jurisdiction herein ceded over lands so repossessed shall revest in the United States: And provided further, That until the cession of jurisdiction shall be accepted by the General Assembly of the State of Maryland or its representative aforesaid the Secretary of War is authorized to adopt as regulations for the government of the said Fort McHenry Military Reservation the rules and regulations promulgated by the board of park commissioners of Baltimore City for the government of other parks of the city of Baltimore, so far as they may apply to the said Fort McHenry Military Reservation: And provided further, That the United States marshal for the district of Maryland is authorized to appoint as his deputies such members of the police force under the government of the said board of park commissioners of the city of Baltimore as may be designated by the said board, and that such deputy marshals shall have power to enforce the said regulations.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, after the word "States," in line 19, strike out all down to the end of line 21, and on page 3 strike out lines 1 to 13, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. If this resolution is adopted, will the whereases and preamble become a part of the law?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. That might take a Philadelphia lawyer to tell, for all that the Chair knows. [Laughter.] It might require a lawyer of first-class attainments to decide that question.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] to the fact that if the preamble does not become a law and is stricken out and only the body of the resolution goes into the statute, it would be impossible, except by hunting up this preamble, to determine what the act meant.

The gentleman will notice that the preamble under the first head refers to the act of May 26, 1914, which granted to the city of Baltimore permission to use a certain portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation as a public park, and in the body of the resolution the language is that "the United States hereby cedes to the State of Maryland jurisdiction over the 'said portion' of the military reservation," and so forth. If the preamble goes out and does not become a part of this law, then the language of the act is not intelligible.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the gentleman will find the whole act harmonious. There was a permit issued by the War Department, and in the body of the bill it refers to that portion of the land covered by the permit. The entire Fort McHenry Reservation is not given to the city of Baltimore, but the major part of it. The other part of it is used as an immigration station, and is not included in this jurisdiction.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the gentleman understands me. There is a certain portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation with regard to which it is proposed to legislate, giving the State jurisdiction over it. Now, query: What is that portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation? It is the portion described in the first whereas of the preamble. But if that goes out and does not become a part of the law, then there is nothing in the resolution itself to indicate what portion is referred to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say to the gentleman that the first whereas refers to the same property that is mentioned on the second page of the bill and mentioned as being in the permit.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that it does.

Mr. MANN. But the preamble is no part of the law.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is assuming that the preamble is going to be a part of this law. I understand that is not the case, but that, as a matter of fact, we do not legislate in preambles. I understand that when this bill becomes a law it will contain only the language beginning with line 1, on page 2, after the words "Be it enacted." Now, that being true, it would be impossible for anyone reading the act to understand what portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation was referred to or what Congress intended to legislate in regard to. What is needed is to strike out the words "such portion," in line 4, and insert a description of that portion referred to in the language in the first section of the preamble.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would have no objection to striking out the preamble, were it not for the fact that I should like to have the Senate know the full history of this legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, I have no interest in the matter at all, except as a Member of the House, desirous of assisting my friend in securing the legislation he wants; but it seems to me that unless he does amend his bill, no one will know, except by inference, what is meant.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I said this bill was drawn by the attorneys of the War Department, and is entirely in harmony with their wishes, and I assume that they knew just what they wanted in this matter.

Mr. MONDELL. The War Department understands matters pertaining to war, but is not presumed to understand all the rules relating to legislation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. When I said the War Department, I meant the Judge Advocate General's office of the War Department. The bill was drawn by the attorneys of the War Department, and is, I understand, entirely in harmony with the previous bills which have been passed in this matter, and with the records of the War Department.

Mr. MONDELL. It may be in harmony with the previous bills, but not in harmony with the rules pertaining to legislation; and when the preamble is stricken out, as it will be, no one will be able to tell from anything in the act what portion of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation is intended to be referred to or legislated on.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I appreciate what he suggests, but the whole matter is a part of the records of the War Department and is easily referred to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the preamble will not be stricken out, though it ought to be. If the preamble was stricken out, there would not be anything left of the law. The part that comes after the enacting clause is the law, not the preamble that precedes it. The preamble is used wholly and only as a matter of reference, and while the preamble is occasionally left in a bill as it passes and is printed in the statutes the preamble itself is not the law, but is only a matter of reference. I am very much surprised that the Judge Advocate General's office does not know any more about such things than to draw a bill the essential facts of which are stated in the preamble and not in the body of the bill itself. They ought to know enough to know, and they do know enough to know, that the part that comes after the enacting clause is the law, and that it ought to contain the essential provisions of the law, and not expect us to pass long preambles, which ordinarily we strike out, in order to have brevity in the statute.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Has the gentleman read the words "such cession to be coextensive territorially with the said permit of June 1, 1914"? That is a part of the War Department record. This bill is identical with the one that ceded jurisdiction to the Presidio, Cal.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I have read that.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Maryland will pardon me, it will not be at all difficult to amend the bill so as to be perfectly clear, and that can be done by striking out the word "said," in line 4, and insert, after the word "reservation," in line 5, the words "permission to use which was granted to the city of Baltimore by the act of May 26, 1914."

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not insisting on it, but I think it is necessary in order to make it clear.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will offer the amendment, I shall be glad to agree to same.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the word "said," in line 4, page 2, and after the word "reservation," in line 5, page 2, insert the words "permission to use which was granted to the city of Baltimore by the act of May 26, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 4, by striking out the word "said," and in line 5 by inserting after the word "reservation" the following: "permission to use which was granted the city of Baltimore by the act of Congress May 26, 1914."

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The preamble was stricken out.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LINTHICUM, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4724) authorizing the Department of Commerce to make original investigation and research concerning forms and processes of manufacture, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be reported first.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized, through the Bureau of Standards, or any other bureau now under the Department of Commerce, or which may be hereafter created in said department, to make original investigation and research concerning forms and processes of manufacture and needs and methods for improvement in manufacture, both generally and specially; but no process or device which may be discovered or invented by any person while employed in or by said department in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be patented for the use or special benefit of any person, but the same shall be open for the general use of all. For the purposes herein indicated the Secretary of Commerce may employ such experts, special agents, clerical assistants, and other help as may be authorized from time to time by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to have some explanation of this.

The SPEAKER. What gentleman has charge of this bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is the author of the bill, although it is reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if there is anything which we are short of in the world of competition for trade, it is scientific work in our own manufacturing institutions. I think it is highly desirable that we should have an enabling act under which we can make from time to time, as the occasion requires, some appropriation for the purpose of carrying on scientific research work through the Department of Commerce, which is a department dealing with manufacturing establishments, to the end that we may first learn something ourselves for the benefit of all concerned, and, secondly, encourage those who are engaged in manufacturing to themselves study and put into practice scientific methods. It is the one thing that we need more than anything else to-day. We have the money, we have the men, we have the mind, but we do not have scientific knowledge and application with which to enable us to meet, as we ought to, competition from abroad. That is the purpose of the bill. I do not think it is going to revolutionize the world, but I think it is a step that we ought to take.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, this is to take up original research work along certain lines which the Department of Commerce may conclude ought to be made.

Mr. MANN. If they so conclude, they would submit to Congress what they wanted, and Congress would determine in the way of appropriation, not by legislation, whether the money should be granted for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that intended to take up the improved methods of manufacture that are in existence now or is it to study up some original matters in reference to manufacture?

Mr. MANN. I suppose to a certain extent both. If they learn through original research, as they do occasionally learn now in the Bureau of Standards, that information ought to be given to everyone alike. This bill would require that to be done, and in whatever direction they acquire the information, which is the result of scientific research work, it would be made public for the benefit of all alike. In other words, great corporations like the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Corporation, and many others employ a very large number of trained scientists in their own work, but the ordinary manufacturing concern, with a small factory, has nothing of that sort. I made an investigation some years ago, by order of the House, of the pulp and paper factories throughout the United States, with other Members of the House on the committee. We went from one pulp factory to another and visited a great many. The one thing that most strongly impressed me was the utter lack of scientific methods generally in use in these concerns, and a very little help from the Government would have been then, and doubtless would be now, of very great value, where each individual concerned does not, probably can not afford to, employ proper scientific people in order to learn the proper scientific methods.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. As I take it from the gentleman's explanation, he is seeking to do here for commerce and manufacturing in a broad way about what has been accomplished under the fundamental law creating the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Not to the same extent.

Mr. LEVER. I would not think so, but in a general way, the same purpose.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to me it is a very good undertaking.

Mr. FOSTER. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated this proposition very clearly, and I believe we ought to have more investigations along the lines suggested by him, and we ought to do something that will help commerce as well as manufacturing in every way that we can. As he says, there are probably a few manufacturing concerns with large capital that do a large business that are able to take up this work, while many others that might be just as important are unable to do so, and this would give the information to the entire country without reserving any rights for any particular manufacturing concern who might be specially interested.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether without this authority the department can not proceed to do just exactly this thing?

Mr. MANN. Without this authority any appropriation for this purpose would be, under the rules of the House, subject to a point of order.

Mr. FESS. I see. I certainly think this is one of the most essential things that could be done, but I supposed that we could do it without such a law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I believe, if this bill becomes a law, that in a very short time we will be launching out very extravagantly in the expenditure of public funds for the benefit of private manufacturers. The Bureau of Standards at the present time is indulging in some of this work covered by this authorization, work that I may say the members of the Committee on Appropriations having the authorization in hand question the propriety of having done as a Government function. For instance, during the past year the Bureau of Standards has been sending its experts to different parts of the country to study electrolysis of rails connected with electric railway systems. Up to the present time the bureau has been limiting its work, except in one or two exceptional cases, to one of which I have just referred, to only those instances where the Government had some special work to be performed as, for instance, the examination of the quality of cloths or of materials in use in the construction of its buildings. Personally I am in sympathy with the general purpose of having investigations made, but if we are going to proceed along this line it means the expenditure of hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars. In 10 years we have seen the Bureau of Standards grow until it now occupies three large buildings and one other projected, with an annual expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars, engaged in very commendable work, which we are limiting alone, except in one or two instances, to functions connected with the Government establishments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman seems to think this might be in the interests of private manufacturers?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question but the bill is for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been reading the bill and have been wondering whether it was not for some other purpose. The manufacturers generally have about as much inspection and investigation on the part of the Department of Commerce now as they can stand and this might add to their difficulties rather than aid them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; it is not intended to embarrass any private manufacturers. It is intended to amplify the work that is now being carried on by the Bureau of Standards, and instead of limiting that work to matters which exclusively pertain to governmental functions and governmental matters, to broaden their activities so that it will cover the whole wide field of commercial manufacturing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Bureau of Standards is a valuable adjunct to our Government system, and it is being very worthily conducted just now, but this bill proposes that it shall be authorized "to make original investigation and research concerning forms and processes of manufacture, and needs and methods for improvement in manufacture, both generally and specially," and so forth. Now, suppose the power thus conferred upon the bureau took the form of inspection, inquiries, reports, and other details that manufacturers must return to the Bureau of Standards. Does not the gentleman think in that case it would rather increase the burdens of the manufacturers than assist them?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under this phraseology the representatives of the Department of Commerce might have the right, if the Committee on Appropriations grant the appropriation, to go into private establishments and investigate their processes of manufacture; but I do not believe they would indulge in that method. I believe they would continue along the lines that they are doing at the present time——

Mr. MANN. Where would they get their right?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is important to know whether it is compulsory, because that raises a very serious question. There is nothing in the bill that seems to make it compulsory.

Mr. STAFFORD. It says to make research concerning processes of manufacture.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the various gentlemen engaged in colloquy permit me to say just one word. I can not find any room for apprehension as to inspection or anything in that respect. It is confined purely to the question of learning something so as to educate our own people how things are done and the best way for them to do them. It will promote production and to-day, under existing circumstances, we can not have too much information. The time is coming more and more rapidly, and even now absolutely demands that we produce not only everything our people are going to need in this country, but also produce something to exchange with other countries for things we can not produce. [Applause.] And I do hope there will be no objection to this most meritorious bill. The committee considered it well at two sessions of Congress, and there can not be any harm in it as I understand it, and with the Bureau of Standards already in existence we would just as well give it something to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Standards has plenty to do under its present authorization.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin know that nearly every item in the legislative bill, which the gentleman helped to report to the House, under the Bureau of Standards is subject to the point of order under existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I did not; and I can not agree with the gentleman to the full extent of his statement.

Mr. MANN. That is certainly the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are some items in the bill subject to the point of order, but there is an authorization under existing law for most of the items reported.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; some might be held in order as being a continuation of work in progress for which we have already made a partial provision, but nearly every one was subject to the point of order when it first appeared in the bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The objection made is that it would entail the expenditure of a lot of money. Does not the gentleman think that the expenditure of money will multiply itself in good results that will more than pay for many, many fold the expenditure?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not questioning the utility of the work of the Bureau of Standards. I am only questioning whether it is a proper governmental function, and whether we should at this time launch out into this new field, in view of some work that has been done, which has not been to the benefit of the people generally, but has been to the benefit of certain localized communities and industries. I fully approve of the work of the Bureau of Standards so far as it relates to investigations as to materials used by the Government, as to stand-ardization and the like; but when it is proposed to launch out into a new field and create an agency here, without limit, why it is going to involve an expenditure ultimately of millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, he will remember last year there was carried in all of the papers an account of Dr. Rittman's discovery down here in the Bureau of Mines, by which he claims he can treble the production of gasoline out of a given quantity of crude oil. Now, would not this give an opportunity for that sort of investigation, the results of which would be very, very many times more than the expenditure?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am frank to say to the gentleman that under this bill such work of investigation could be accomplished.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask if under the provisions of this bill a manufacturer had some secret process for producing goods, which for some reasons of his own he did not see fit to patent, an investigator from the Department of Commerce would have authority to go into his plant, look over the process of manufacture, and then come out and make it public and open it to other manufacturers and competitors?

Mr. STAFFORD. That authority has been denied, and it is a mooted question whether under this phraseology an investigator would have that right. Of course, if he would have that authority, I would feel compelled to object to the bill, but I question whether this language will bear that particular construction.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not think the Government would have any right to go into a private factory and steal their process? We would have no power to do that, it seems to me, at all.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill would have pertinency in connection with the act of 1910, whereby we gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to investigate railroad wrecks. Among the powers granted there was the power of having an inspector go to a wreck and investigate the causes. Many of these wrecks have been found due to defective rails and defective flanges of wheels. These rails have been sent to the Bureau of Standards for investigation by the scientists of that bureau, also some of the defective wheels. The bureau has not now the equipment necessary to make a thorough test of those rails and wheels.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit right there?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to take issue with that statement, for on a recent visit to the Bureau of Standards we were shown by the director ample instruments for determining that very matter.

Mr. ESCH. My information comes direct from the division of inspection of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with a further statement that that commission has sent many defective rails and wheels to be investigated and tested by the private plants and workshops of the different railroads of the United States. The Bureau of Standards has not the full equipment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not questioning that private establishments have not, but I am maintaining that at the present time the Bureau of Standards is equipped with machinery to determine the tensile strength and the quality of the steel in rails and wheels. In fact, they have issued a bulletin, they have samples which they distribute to the public generally, showing the character of mixtures of steel that should be used in furnaces and the like and in the manufacture of steel.

Mr. ESCH. They have made recommendations that the open-hearth process of steel manufacture is better than the Bessemer, and I think they recommended that the electrical furnace product is even better than the open-hearth product, but nevertheless they have not the full equipment to meet the demands of the Division of Safety of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This bill would grant them those added facilities.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, though I fear this bill will result in having the Government launch into many fields of activity which I question it should, I am not going to interpose an objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4724) authorizing the Department of Commerce to make original investigation and research concerning forms and processes of manufacture, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized, through the Bureau of Standards or any other bureau now under the Department of Commerce or which may be hereafter created in said department, to make original investigation and research concerning forms and processes of manufacture and needs and methods for improvement in manufacture, both generally and specially; but no process or device which may be discovered or invented by any person while employed in or by said department in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be patented for the use or special benefit of any person, but the same shall be open for the general use of all. For the purposes herein indicated the Secretary of Commerce may employ such experts, special agents, clerical assistants, and other help as may be authorized from time to time by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who framed the bill whether it is his purpose to restrict the granting of a patent only to this country? Does he wish to prohibit the inventor of any device from taking out foreign patents?

Mr. MANN. I think that anyone who learns anything through research under this bill should give that information for the benefit of the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if our Government is paying men for the benefit of our own manufacturers, I can not see any objection to allowing the inventor to take out foreign patents, if he so wishes, so as to give him protection, and which would not embarrass the users in this country.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not see how it is practicable for the Government itself to own foreign patents. I do not think it is desirable that the officials whom our Government selects to make investigations should be allowed to make anything on the side by means of patents.

Mr. STAFFORD. While I can see some objections to their taking out patents in this country on their inventions, yet I do not see any objection to allowing them to take out patents in foreign countries.

At the Bureau of Standards a recent graduate of one of our universities has invented a device during the time of the Government, whereby he can detect by just moving a screen the air waves, no matter how many thousands of miles removed, in wireless telegraphy. That man, being paid by the Government, is giving his invention to the United States free; but why should he not have the benefit of that invention, so far as foreign countries are concerned?

Mr. MANN. Oh, if you give a man a patent on these things, that will be what he will be looking for all the time. If he can get any special benefit out of it, that is the way he will conduct his work. He ought to feel that he should attend to his work, regardless of finding some patentable device which can be sold to foreign countries. Most of these things ought not to be patented anyway, in my opinion.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that foreign Governments are very jealous of their processes, and that they do not open their doors to the inspection of their secret processes. But here we are proposing to employ experts and give the foreigners the value of these inventions.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that this Government or the Government of any other country obtains any information which it can keep secret.

Mr. STAFFORD. I propose to allow the inventors to get the benefit of their inventions only so far as foreign countries are concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withdraws his pro forma amendment. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

BRIDGE ACROSS FLINT RIVER, GA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9225) granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Georgia Lumoer Co., a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Ohio, with principal place of business in the city of Akron, Ohio, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Flint River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near De Vaughn's Siding, in the county of Dooly, in the State of Georgia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the national defense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the national defense. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER, PITTSBURGH, PA.

The next business on the Celandar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10032) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Allegheny, in the State of Pennsylvania, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto over the Ohio River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and also an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same," approved December 17, 1872, as amended by the act approved February 14, 1883.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 5, after the word "six," strike out the comma and the remainder of the line down to and including line 10.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

BRIDGE ACROSS SNAKE RIVER, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9920) granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill 3873 is of the same tenor, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 3873, of identical tenor, be considered in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 3873) to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Snake River, at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, in sections 7, 8, 17, and 18, township 9 south, range 25 east, Boise meridian, in the counties of Minidoka and Cassie, in the State of Idaho, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the printed copy of the Senate bill, as we have it, contains a typographical error in line 9, where the word "Cassia" is misspelled, but I have examined the enrolled copy of the bill, which is the one that we go by, and find that that is correct.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DILLON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was ordered to lie on the table.

By unanimous consent the corresponding House bill was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY SCHOOLS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 5,000 additional copies of report 243, on the military school bill, be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asks unanimous consent that 5,000 extra copies of report 243 be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman conferred with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have. This is a very short report, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] told me I might say to the House that he had no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, how is it proposed that these reports shall be distributed?

Mr. McKELLAR. Through the document room. The print of the report is exhausted, and more copies are desired.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MERRIMACK RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11628) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimac River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, a municipal corporation, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Merrimac River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, to replace the present Pawtucket Bridge, so called, and at or near the point at which said Pawtucket Bridge crosses said river, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by adding the letter "k" to the word "Merrimac," in line 7, page 1. I will say to the chairman of the committee that when I introduced the bill the name was correctly spelled, with the letter "k," but in printing it the "k" was dropped.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am sure the committee had no desire to mutilate the orthography of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, and as far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The Government Printing Office say that the gentleman is wrong, and that is the reason why they changed it, I suppose.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 1, strike out "Merrimac" and insert "Merrimack."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MANN. The title ought to be amended.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that the title be amended in the same way.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title will be amended to conform to the spelling of the text of the bill.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, March 7, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $100,000, being additional to the estimates submitted by the commission beginning on page 855, of the annual Book of Estimates for 1917, for salaries and expenses of the Federal Trade Commission (H. Doc. No. 838), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10307) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay and to distribute the balance now in the Treasury to the credit of the Alsea and other Indians on the Siletz Reservation, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 298), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DANFORTH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12195) to amend section 17 of the United States bankruptcy law of July 1, 1898, and amendments thereto of February 5, 1903, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 299), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7619) to repeal section 3 of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, enacted July 27, 1892, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 300), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11939) for the relief of William Guy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 301), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSSELL of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11400) for the relief of the heirs of Isham Butterworth, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 302), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6770) for the relief of Ellen B. Monahan, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 303), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HAY: A bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Res. 85), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for nation-wide prohibition of the beverage traffic in intoxicating liquors; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution adopted by Portersville United Presbyterian Church, favoring adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution adopted by the Central Presbyterian Church, of New Castle, Pa., numbering 1,000 people, favoring adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the sale, manufacture for sale, transportation, importation, and exportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution adopted by Daniel Commandery, No. 474, Ancient and Illustrious Order Knights of Malta, protesting against enactment of House bills 6468 and 491; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, resolution adopted by citizens of New Brighton, Pa., favoring antipolygamy amendment to the United States Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution adopted by the Italian Methodist Episcopal Church of New Castle, Pa., numbering 84 people, favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the sale, manufacture for sale, transportation for sale, importation and exportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TILSON: Petition of H. P. Helwig and others, of Mulford, Conn., in favor of the Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of Rev. J. W. Musson and others and Meriden Christian Endeavor Union, of Meriden, Conn., for prohibition in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Memorial of citizens of Ellicott, Colo., opposing appropriations for increase of armament; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WASON: Resolutions adopted by the United Garment Workers of America, Local No. 179, of Whitefield, N. H., favoring the passage of a resolution providing for a committee to investigate the sanitary condition of dairies; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Petition of K. A. Shawhem and 259 others, protesting against the passage of House bill 6468, a bill to amend the postal laws of the United States; also House bill 491, with the same title; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, March 3, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will please call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Husting	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Beckham	James	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sterling
Broussard	Jones	Phelan	Stone
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pittman	Sutherland
Clapp	Kern	Poindexter	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Pomerene	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Tillman
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Reed	Vardaman
Cummins	Lodge	Robinson	Wadsworth
Curtis	McLean	Shafroth	Warren
Fall	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Williams
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shields
Harding	Myers	Simmons
Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I desire to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

I also desire to announce that there are absent on official business the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. This announcement I ask may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. OLIVER. Out of order, I ask leave to submit on behalf of myself a proposed amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 12207).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

Mr. OLIVER. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. PENROSE], who is necessarily absent, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484). I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be granted, without displacing the unfinished business.

TREATMENT OF TUBERCULOSIS.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 4843) to provide Federal aid in caring for indigent tuberculous persons, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

NAVAL RESERVE.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Out of order, or in order, I ask leave——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] first.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 4844) to create a United States naval reserve, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I shall object to any further morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether the Senator yields or not, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That prevents me from extending the courtesy I would be glad to extend.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me? I think before the Senator begins his remarks the unfinished business ought to be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the pending business, having been before the Senate when the recess was taken.

Mr. NELSON. If it is the unfinished business, very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is pending now. The Senator from Utah is entitled to the floor.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, what I shall have to say this morning will be not immediately connected with the unfinished business.

Mr. President, it is quite natural in a great war such as now involves almost the whole of Europe that individual American citizens should sympathize with the cause of one side or the other, and this is particularly to be expected in the case of those of foreign birth or of recent foreign ancestry. There is nothing in such a sentiment to condemn or even deplore. For a citizen of German birth or descent to sympathize with or look forward with anxious hope to the success of Teutonic arms, or for a citizen of English or French or Russian birth or descent to sympathize with and pray for the victory of the allies, is precisely what might be anticipated, and constitutes no breach of civic duty as far as this Government is concerned. Such an attitude of mind is entirely consistent with unimpaired loyalty to this country and readiness to bear arms in its defense, if need be, against even the land of one's birth and ancestry. To say that the individual citizen, in the face of the passionate and titanic struggle which holds the foremost nations of Europe in the very shadow of destruction, should remain neutral in thought and speech is to talk nonsense and to ask an impossibility. But, Mr. President, the question with which we are now confronted is not one of sympathy as between outside contending parties, but it is one which threatens or at least gravely affects American rights. Confronted by such a question every sentiment must be merged in the common duty of presenting a firm and united front in support of this country as against the world. Neutrality, as determined by international law, is not an individual obligation. It is a duty which one nation owes to other nations which are at war. A citizen may not only freely indulge his sympathies for one of the belligerents as against the other, but he may within certain limits extend direct aid, as, for example, the sale of munitions of war, the loan of money, and so on. The Government, however, is bound to rigidly maintain an attitude of strict impartiality between the belligerents. For the Government to commit a breach of neutrality is to put itself in a very serious position—one which may justify a declaration of war upon the part of that belligerent who may be injured by the breach. It is the custom of this Government, though not of all Governments, to issue a proclamation of neutrality at the beginning of a war, setting forth with more or less particularity the general principles by which it will be bound. In accordance with this policy, at the beginning of the present war the President issued such a proclamation, in the course of which certain rules were definitely stated as among the principles by which we should be governed. Among others, I quote the following:

> And I do hereby warn all citizens of the United States, and all persons residing or being within its territory or jurisdiction, that, while the free and full expression of sympathies in public and private is not restricted by the laws of the United States, military forces in aid of a belligerent can not lawfully be originated or organized within its jurisdiction; and that, while all persons may lawfully and without restriction by reason of the aforesaid state of war manufacture and sell within the United States arms and munitions of war and other articles ordinarily known as "contraband of war," yet they can not carry such articles upon the high seas for the use or service of a belligerent, nor can they transport soldiers and officers of a belligerent, or attempt to break any blockade which may be lawfully established and maintained during the said wars without incurring the risk of hostile capture and the penalties denounced by the law of nations in that behalf.

On September 19, 1914, in the early days of the war, Mr. Lansing, then Acting Secretary of State, in a circular relating to armed merchantmen, which was sent to representatives of all foreign powers, among other things announced this general rule: "A merchant vessel of belligerent nationality may carry an armament and munitions for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship of war." My understanding is that this correctly states the rule recognized by substantially all the authorities who have spoken upon the subject. In the great struggle which is now raging our position is one of extreme delicacy. The belligerent nations are engaged in a war for what they believe to be their very existence. What they do is done in hot blood; what we do should be done in cool blood. It may not always be possible for us to determine as between conflicting claims what is precisely the wise and impartial thing to do, but there is one general policy that we can creditably follow, and that is to ascertain definitely what were the rules of international law affecting the question of neutrality in force at the opening of hostilities, and then adhere to them strictly and impartially, whatever may be the incidental effect of our adherence upon any of the belligerent powers. If we do that, we shall at least preserve our attitude of neutrality. It is possible that we may modify our position and still preserve that attitude, but we are more likely to be guilty of unfairness to somebody, and indeed, as I shall presently show, to be guilty of a breach of neutrality or a distinctly unfriendly act, which may involve serious and perhaps disastrous consequences.

These general observations have a bearing upon the two questions that have led to much recent discussion: First, that relating to the arming of merchant vessels for defensive purposes and the use of such vessels by our citizens for travel; and, second, that relating to the trade of our citizens in munitions of war. I desire very briefly to discuss both of these matters, and first that of the right of a merchant vessel of a belligerent nation to carry arms for defensive purposes only. That such right exists is clearly laid down in the circular of the State Department from which I have already quoted. The general rule is established by substantially all the authorities and has nowhere been more clearly stated than by Mr. A. Pearce Higgins, in a recent article, from which I quote as follows:

> The right of a merchant ship to defend herself and to be armed for that purpose has not, so far as I am aware, been doubted for two centuries, until the question has again become one of practical importance. The historical evidence of the practice down to the year 1815 is overwhelming. Dr. Schramm, in his elaborate denial of the right fails to distinguish between the position in which a belligerent warship stands to an enemy merchant ship, and that in which it stands to a neutral merchant ship. This failure is important and goes to the root of the matter, for whereas the visit of a belligerent warship to an enemy merchant ship is, under existing law, merely the first step to capture and is itself a hostile act, and is undertaken solely in order to enable the captor to ascertain that the ship is one which is not exempt by custom, treaty, or convention from capture, the visit to a neutral ship, though justified by the fact of the existence of war, is not a hostile act. By long custom a belligerent warship has a right of visit and search of all neutral merchant vessels, and this right is exercised in order to ascertain whether a vessel is in fact neutral and not engaged in any acts such as attempting to break blockade, the carriage of contraband, or the performance of any unneutral service which would justify its detention and condemnation. "It has been truly denominated a right growing out of and ancillary to the greater right of capture. Where this greater right may be legally exercised without search (as in the case of enemy ships) the right of search can never arise or come into question." A belligerent warship has a right to capture an enemy merchant ship, and the latter is under no duty to submit; it has a corresponding right to resist capture, which is an act of violence and hostility. By resisting, the belligerent violates no duty, he is held by force, and may escape if he can. But forcible resistance, as distinct from flight, on the part of a neutral merchant ship is universally admitted as a just ground for the condemnation of the ship, for a neutral is under a duty to submit to belligerent visit. (S. Doc. No. 332, 64th Cong., p. 32.)

It is said, however, that the advent of the submarine, a new weapon, weak in defensive power, has brought about an alteration of the rule, upon the principle embodied in a very old and respectable maxim of the common law, cessante ratione legis cessat ipsa lex—the reason of the law ceasing, the law itself ceases. No one doubts the wisdom of the maxim, but does it apply? We must not confuse the reason which gives life to the law with the incidental circumstances which may accompany the operation of it, but do not condition the law itself. The crime of murder was never dependent upon the character of the instrument by which it was committed. The crime itself antedated the invention of gunpowder, but the advent of that substance in no way altered the constituent elements which characterized the crime. When the gun took the place of the knife and the bludgeon as the implement of assassination, these constituent elements were not in any manner affected. The rule of international law was that a belligerent merchant ship might arm for defense and might forcibly defend herself against the attack of an enemy—not an enemy armed in a particular way, but an enemy armed in any way. It is true that a merchant vessel so armed seldom, if ever, resisted the attack of a warship, but that was not because it had no right to resist, but because resistance was futile. The rule was, further, that the merchant ship could not lawfully be sunk until after warning and an opportunity given to crew and passengers to escape in safety. The claim that the submarine is a war vessel of such weak defensive ability that a merchant vessel may not defend against its attack, and that it is absolved from giving warning because to do so might invite its own destruction, does not, in my judgment, present a case that calls for the application of the maxim. The rule allowing defensive armament upon and requiring previous warning to a merchant vessel was not based upon the reason that a ship of war was in no danger from the slight defensive armament that was carried, but it was based upon the supreme right of self-defense, and upon the consideration that it was not in accordance with the principles of civilized warfare that the lives of civilian crews and passengers should be destroyed without previous warning and full opportunity to save themselves. That reason, founded upon the dictates of humanity, is not affected in the least because a vulnerable submarine may be used in place of an invincible man-of-war. This humane rule has heretofore existed without qualification. If it could not be complied with for any reason, it was not admissible to destroy the ship and jeopardize the lives of her crew and passengers.

The proposition now insisted upon, baldly stated, is simply this, that when a new engine of destruction is invented that can not be made entirely effective without violating the law, the law is ipso facto automatically modified. Under these circumstances my own view of the matter is that the new weapon must yield to the law and not that the law must yield to the new weapon. What would be thought of a similar claim made by a citizen with reference to a domestic law, namely, that if new and unforeseen conditions arise rendering it highly inconvenient to comply with the law compliance must be dispensed with? It seems to me a far more logical conclusion is that if the submarine can not be utilized effectively without violating this long-established and humane rule of international law that fact constitutes persuasive ground not for repudiating the law but for holding that the submarine, since it can not be used in accordance with the law, may not be used at all against merchant shipping, but must be confined to operating against vessels of war alone. However this may be, according to all fundamental principles and rules of logical construction, the invention and use of a new weapon of warfare should not be considered as depriving the noncombatant civilian of long-established and heretofore universally recognized rights. If we concede that the rule no longer applies to ships armed for defense alone we must be prepared to face a probable condition much more serious than that involved in the destruction of an armed vessel without warning. To concede the right of a submarine to sink a vessel so armed without giving warning and opportunity for crew and passengers to escape in safety will be to invite the sinking of unarmed vessels without warning as well, since it is well-nigh impossible for the officers of a submarine, under the conditions which surround them, to determine in advance whether a given vessel is armed or not. They will, therefore, be tempted to act upon conjecture or suspicion. It is said that the ship can not be halted in order to make an inspection, for that would be to risk the destruction of the submarine if it turned out that the merchant ship was in fact armed. Indeed, that is the basis of the claim that an armed vessel may be sunk without warning. It is a general rule that if one is authorized to do a thing upon the existence of a particular condition he is justified in acting upon the reasonable belief that such condition does in fact exist.

If, therefore, the commander of a submarine claims to act upon appearances, we shall never be able to determine whether these appearances justified his conclusion until after the vessel and her crew and passengers have gone to the bottom of the sea, and in some cases not even then. The result will be that unarmed vessels, while possessing immunity in theory, will have none in fact; and while ostensibly conceding the right to sink armed vessels only, we shall in fact have conceded the right to sink unarmed vessels as well, since if the submarine possess the right to sink an armed vessel, the claim of justification will be difficult to meet whenever the commander, sinking any vessel, insists that he had reasonable ground for the belief that it was armed.

The question next arises—and, indeed, it is really the crucial question—shall our citizens be officially advised to forbear from traveling upon belligerent merchant vessels armed for defense only? Or, indeed, shall we go further, as some people insist, and forbid their doing so under penalty for disobedience? If I am correct in what I have already said, namely, that these merchant ships have the right to carry defensive armament, it follows that such a ship has the same status as though unarmed and that the right of a neutral citizen to transport his goods or travel upon either is the same, and not a different right; and that, in fact, is the decision of our own Supreme Court in a great case decided many years ago and never since overruled or modified. (The Nereide, 9 Cranch, 388.) The decision was rendered by Chief Justice Marshall, and in the course of it he said:

A belligerent has a perfect right to arm in his own defense, and a neutral has a perfect right to transport his goods in a belligerent vessel. These rights do not interfere with each other. The neutral has no control over the belligerent right to arm—ought he to be accountable for the exercise of it? * * * The object of the neutral is the transportation of his goods. His connection with the vessel which transports them is the same whether that vessel be armed or unarmed. The act of arming is not his; it is the act of a party who has a right to do so. He meddles not with the armament nor with the war. Whether his goods were on board or not, the vessel would be armed and would sail. His goods do not contribute to the armament further than the freight he pays and freight he would pay were the vessel unarmed. It is difficult to perceive in this argument anything which does not also apply to an unarmed vessel. In both instances it is the right and the duty of the carrier to avoid capture and to prevent a search. There is no difference except in the degree of capacity to carry this duty into effect. The argument would operate against the rule which permits the neutral merchant to employ a belligerent vessel without imparting to his goods the belligerent character. The argument respecting resistance stands upon the same ground with that which respects arming. Both are lawful. Neither of them is chargeable to the goods or their owner where he has taken no part in it. They are incidents to the character of the vessel, and may always occur where the carrier is belligerent. If the neutral character of the goods is forfeited by the resistance of the belligerent vessel, why is not the neutral character of the passengers forfeited by the same cause? The master and crew are prisoners of war; why are not those passengers who did not engage in the conflict also prisoners? That they are not would seem to the court to afford a strong argument in favor of the goods. The law would operate in the same manner on both.

Nothing, Mr. President, it seems to me, could be more clear and more conclusive than that statement made by the great Chief Justice.

If, therefore, a citizen take passage upon a ship so armed and lose his life by the sinking of the ship without warning, what must be the contention and claim of this Government? To my mind, clearly this: That the citizen in the exercise of a clear right has been deprived of his life by the deliberately illegal act of the belligerent Government which sent the submarine on its mission of death. Others are welcome to their own opinions, but I can conceive of no other position for this Government to assume; and unless it is willing to forfeit the respect of mankind by becoming a craven thing, it must be prepared to sustain that position at whatever cost or consequence. However desirable it may be that our citizens for their own sakes should refrain from traveling upon defensively armed ships, it is quite another matter for the Government to advise or order them to do so. So long as he violates no law an American citizen may pursue his business in his own way, even though it may be a dangerous business or a dangerous way. It is not to be presumed that he will recklessly or needlessly put his life in danger—indeed, all presumptions are to the contrary—and no resolution of Congress can possibly advise him of any danger of sea travel which he does not already fully understand. But, Mr. President, what of the American citizens scattered about the world engaged in lawful pursuits who are from time to time obliged to travel upon the sea from and to ports between which neutral ships do not ply? What is the citizen so placed to do? Is he to indefinitely maroon himself, however imperatively his presence may be required elsewhere? If not, and he be entitled to the protection of his Government in the exercise, and perhaps in the vitally necessary exercise, of his lawful right of travel upon a belligerent merchant vessel armed for defense, upon what theory consistent with national courage and self-respect can Congress or the Executive interfere with or forbid the use of his own discretion in the matter? I am one of those who desire peace. I detest the bully and the brawler among nations as I do among individuals. I would sacrifice much to avoid war—pride of opinion, money, property, comfort—I would fight over no wrongs which money could compensate—but a nation, when all other means fail, that will not resent a flagrant and illegal attack upon the lives of its own citizens is only less detestable than a man who will not fight for his wife and children. And so, sir, believing as I do about that, satisfied as I am that—advice or no advice—if the life of an American citizen be again taken by the illegal and deliberate sinking without warning of a merchant ship, unarmed or armed only for defense, that this Government should hold the offending nation to a stern reckoning, I shall never give my consent to the issuance of a formal and official notice such as has been proposed, which, if not heeded, would, without minimizing our duty in the least, have the effect of embarrassing and weakening our moral standing if we should once more be under the sad necessity of seeking reparation for the destruction of the lives of our people. I repeat, sir, that I do not want war at any time, and I pray God that it may not come now; but I would rather have war with all its sacrifices and suffering than that this Nation, with its long history of heroism and glory, should play the poltroon when confronted by a supreme national duty, because it places a greater value upon its ease than upon its honor.

Nothing in the long run can be more certain to bring trouble upon us than a policy of timidity and vacillation. Such a policy is not in keeping with American traditions or spirit. It is the duty of a self-respecting Nation to stand, and to stand firmly, for the rights of every citizen however humble against foreign aggression from any source however powerful. That is what the Federal Government is for, since the State in which the citizen lives protects him in his domestic rights. The doctrine that the citizen exists for the sake of the Government has never found place in our political philosophy. If ours is a government of the people and for the people, it exists for the sake of the citizen. If the individual owes the duty of support and obedience to the Government, surely the Government owes him the reciprocal duty of protection.

If we shall ever again have a war with another country, it is more likely to result from some deprivation of rights suffered by our citizens than from any other cause. In Mexico they have been unspeakably outraged—insulted, robbed, murdered—and this series of Mexican outrages has been interspersed with maritime horrors involved in the sinking of the Lusitania, the Ancona, and the others, with their shocking loss of American life; and we have borne it and are bearing it all with a patience which begins to have a suspicious look of pusillanimity. We have demanded reparation, and have kept on making such demands, with decreased rather than increased insistency. The offenders have not been held to accountability, strict or otherwise, and we are now confronted with the proposal not that we shall insist upon reparation for wrongs already suffered but that we shall restrain our citizens from the further exercise of their rights for fear we may be put to the trouble and perhaps the danger of vindicating them. Mr. President, I for one am becoming sick and tired of the spineless policy of retreat and scuttle—the policy that, among other things, has ordered our people to abandon their rights in Mexico and that has made us flee our plain duty in the Philippines. Instead of forever telling our citizens to run, I should like for once to hear somebody bid them stand, with the assurance that their Government will stand with them. Instead of warning our own people to exercise their rights at their peril, I would like to see issued a warning to other people to interfere with these rights at their peril. The danger of it all is that by this policy of always backing down instead of backing up we shall encourage an increased encroachment upon our rights until we shall finally be driven into a crisis from which nothing but war can extricate us.

I come now to a brief discussion of the second question. There is a demand on the part of a good many people that we shall prohibit the exportation of munitions of war. I am opposed to any such embargo for two reasons: First, because it would clearly constitute a breach of neutrality; and, second, it would inaugurate a policy from which the United States itself in the future might become the greatest sufferer, since if we should be attacked by a great nation possessing overwhelming military strength we might be dependent upon neutral countries—at least in the early stages of the conflict—for a supply of munitions with which to repel the attack. The rule of international law, recognized almost universally, is that citizens of a neutral country have a lawful right to sell and deliver to belligerent powers arms and munitions of war, without limit as to character or quantity. This has been the rule laid down by the responsible officials of the United States from the beginning of our history to the present day. As early as 1793 Mr. Jefferson said:

Our citizens have always been free to make, vend, and export arms; that it is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings—the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence—because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace has not required from them such an internal derangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President's proclamation—that of confiscation of such portion of these arms as shall fall into the hands of any of the belligerent powers on their way to the ports of their enemies. To this penalty our citizens are warned that they will be abandoned; and that the purchases of arms here may work no inequality between the parties at war, the liberty to make them will be enjoyed equally by both.

Alexander Hamilton the same year said:

The purchasing within and exporting from the United States by way of merchandise articles commonly called contraband, being generally warlike instruments and military stores, is free to all the parties at war and is not to be interfered with.

President Pierce in 1855, in his third annual message to Congress, said:

In pursuance of this policy the laws of the United States do not forbid their citizens to sell to either of the belligerent powers articles contraband of war or take munitions of war or soldiers on board their private ships for transportation; and although in so doing the individual citizen exposes his property or person to some of the hazards of war, his acts do not involve any breach of national neutrality nor of themselves implicate the Government. Thus, during the progress of the present war in Europe, our citizens have, without national responsibility therefor, sold gunpowder and arms to all buyers, regardless of the destination of those articles. Our merchantmen have been, and still continue to be, largely employed by Great Britain and by France in transporting troops, provisions, and munitions of war to the principal seat of military operations and in bringing home their sick and wounded soldiers; but such use of our mercantile marine is not interdicted either by the international or by our municipal law, and therefore does not compromit our neutral relations with Russia.

Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, declared to Mr. Molina, minister from Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Salvador, on March 16, 1854, that—

The mere exportation of arms and munitions of war from the United States to a belligerent country has never, however, been considered as an offense against the act of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818. All belligerents enjoy this right equally, and a privilege which is open to all can not justly be complained of by any one party to a war.

The Supreme Court of the United States has announced the same doctrine. Mr. Justice Story, in the Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheat., 283), says:

But there is nothing in our laws or in the law of nations that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation.

The neutrality proclamation issued by our Government at the beginning of the war, as I have already shown, contained the following language:

All persons may lawfully and without restriction, by reason of the aforesaid state of war, manufacture and sell within the United States arms and munitions of war and other articles ordinarily known as "contraband of war."

Would a change in this rule made now constitute a breach of our neutrality? Clearly I think it would. It will be conceded by everybody that to now forbid the sale and exportation of arms to the nations at war would be to the great advantage of Germany and the powers cooperating with her and to the great disadvantage of the entente allies. It is probably safe to say that it would be equivalent to adding a half million men to the German Army. A nation, like an individual, is presumed to intend the consequences resulting from its actions. In Hall's International Law, fourth edition, page 80, it is said:

An act of the State which is prejudicial to the belligerent is necessarily done with the intent to injure.

If we now put an embargo on arms and war munitions we could not escape the conclusion, therefore, that we intend thereby to aid one of the belligerents and injure the other, since that would be the inevitable and clearly foreseen result. The allies would be justified in regarding it not only as a breach of neutrality but as a deliberately unfriendly act. This is the effect of all the authorities. Mr. Webster, in a letter to Mr. Thompson, dated July 8, 1842, says:

The trade in articles contraband of war is carried on at the risk of those engaged in it, under the liabilities and penalties prescribed by the law of nations or particular treaties. If it be true, therefore, that citizens of the United States have been engaged in a commerce by which Texas, an enemy of Mexico, has been supplied with arms and munitions of war, the Government of the United States nevertheless was not bound to prevent it, could not have prevented it without a manifest departure from the principles of neutrality, and is in no wise answerable for the consequences.

Westlake, page 190, says:

Neutrality enjoins abstinence from taking part in any operation of war and from interfering with any operation of war which is legitimate as between the belligerents, but not abstinence from anything merely because it strengthens a belligerent.

Hall states the rule as follows:

If, therefore, a people desires not to be an enemy of either belligerent, its amity must be colorless in the eyes of both; in its corporate capacity as a State it must abstain altogether from mixing itself up in their quarrel.

Mr. John Bassett Moore, in a recent speech delivered before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, at Philadelphia, says:

What we call neutrality is a system of conduct regulated not by the emotions nor by the individual conceptions of propriety but by certain well-defined rules, and it is synonymous with impartiality only in the sense that those rules are to be enforced with impartial rigor upon all belligerents.

The question was considered by the second Hague conference under the heading, "Rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war" (sixth paragraph of preamble to convention):

Seeing that it is desirable that the powers should issue detailed enactments to regulate the results of the attitude of neutrality when adopted by them;

Seeing that it is, for neutral powers, an admitted duty to apply these rules impartially to the several belligerents;

Seeing that, in this category of ideas, these rules should not, in principle, be altered in the course of the war by a neutral power except in a case where experience has shown the necessity for such change for the protection of the rights of that power.

Attorney General Charles Lee, of Virginia, rendered the following opinion (1 Op. Atty. Gen., 61):

That an enemy may come into the territory of a neutral nation and there purchase and thence remove any article whatsoever, even instruments of war, is a law of nations long and universally established. Horses are, and for a long time have been, an article of commerce from the United States; and though they are by certain treaties an article of contraband, as by the treaty with France, yet, according to the above principle, they may be purchased and exported by the enemies of France. To deny a right to either of the belligerent powers to carry on this trade without denying to both would be a departure from that line of perfect neutrality which the United States have invariably observed. It is true this right may be denied to all nations by a law to be passed for that purpose at this time; but if the reason for passing such a law be to impede the military operations of either belligerent power and to favor the other, it is manifest that such conduct would be a breach of neutrality; consequently, while the French and the British are equally permitted to purchase horses and export them from any of the States, as they heretofore have been and now are permitted, neither have any just cause of complaint.

See statement of Secretary Pickering (1 American State Papers, p. 649), as follows:

It is well known that a considerable portion of the exports of the United States consists of articles contraband of war. It is well known that these have, during the whole of the present war, been freely exported to the dominions of France as well as to those of the other belligerent powers. It seems, then, too late (agreeably to Galliani's fourth position) for France to desire that the citizens of the United States should now abandon a commerce of which she has availed herself during the several years of the war at this time; and still less ought she, while continuing to enjoy an otherwise unrestrained trade in contraband goods, to expect such an abandonment of only a particular article of contraband of which she may have no need, and is therefore willing to renounce, because it may chance to be very useful to her enemy. Under these circumstances a compliance on the part of the United States would compromit their interests as well as their neutrality. The wants of two or more belligerent powers may together embrace the general objects of the commerce of a neutral nation, but if each were possessed of a right to require the neutral nation to renounce that portion of its commerce which was peculiarly useful to its enemy, the entire commerce of such neutral nation might be annihilated.

Finally, the views of an eminent German writer, Paul Einicke, may be quoted:

The opinion of Liepmann that a neutral State by forbidding contraband trade assists one of the belligerents and influences the chances of war consequently impairs neutrality is not founded on practice. Belligerents have never objected to the issuance of prohibitions. However, such prohibitions may be regarded as impairing neutrality, or even as unfriendly acts, if they ensue during hostilities and unexpectedly dam the sources upon which one party had until then relied. (Rights and Duties of Neutrals, p. 99.)

It is plain, therefore, that if a change in the rule with respect to the sale of munitions of war or with respect to the arming of belligerent merchantmen for defense is to be made by our domestic law, such a change can not be made now, since it would constitute a serious breach of neutrality, which would be tremendously emphasized when our action in the midst of the conflict was contrasted with our proclamation of neutrality and our circular of instructions of a diametrically opposite character issued at the opening of hostilities. But even if peace prevailed, a change in the rule is, to say the least, of doubtful wisdom and doubtful morality. There are many nations, like our own, who do not customarily maintain great military establishments in time of peace, while there are other nations who have adopted a contrary policy. If, then, the rule which permits the citizens of a neutral country in time of war to sell and furnish arms and munitions to the belligerents should be abolished and every country engaging in war be compelled to rely upon its own resources, we should probably be putting a premium upon extravagant military preparation, because one nation, knowing that it must depend wholly upon its own resources in case of war, would look with increased alarm upon great military preparation on the part of another nation with which it might come into armed conflict and would increase its military strength accordingly. Such a change in the rule would be to the disadvantage of every real democracy and to the advantage of every autocracy in the world, because democracies are notoriously weak in military preparation in time of peace. Under the rule, however, by which the whole neutral world in time of war becomes a market place in which the belligerent democracies may purchase their weapons of defense the military superiority of the autocracy is, in a large measure, offset. If we should now take the first step which would finally result in the establishment of a general rule prohibiting the sale of munitions of war by citizens of neutral countries to belligerents, it is not at all unlikely that we might ourselves become the first victims of the new dispensation. It has been our custom, in accordance with the usual practice of democracies, to delay serious military preparation until war was declared. Thus far we have sometimes creditably gotten through, and sometimes muddled through; but suppose at no far-distant day some great military power with a vast army, vast military resources, dissatisfied with something we have done, or pretending to be dissatisfied, should take advantage of our defenseless condition and set in motion its tremendous instruments of war against us. If in that situation there should be added to our lack of a trained army a lack of arms and munitions, and if the neutral markets of the world should be closed to us, none of us, I think, would care to contemplate the unhappy and humiliating fate which we might be compelled to face.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. The substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment that happens to be at this moment in the possession of the Senator from Tennessee, but I should like to have it sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Either proposition is open to amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the substitute of the Senator from Wisconsin was not offered. He discussed it, but I do not understand that it was offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood it had been formally offered. What is the pleasure of the Senate? What is before the Senate? What have we to do?

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask for a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the original bill, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following section:

SEC. 14. The term "navigable waters" as used in this act and as applied to streams shall be construed to include only such streams or parts of streams as are in their ordinary, natural condition used for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce, or which, through improvement heretofore or hereafter made, have been or shall become usable in such commerce. As to all other streams or parts of streams over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, permission is hereby given to construct dams therein, subject, however, to removal or reconstruction, without expense to the United States unless utilized by the United States, whenever the United States enters upon the improvement thereof for the purpose of making the same usable for interstate or foreign transportation: Provided, That any person who proposes to construct a dam in any such last-mentioned stream or part of stream may make application to the Secretary of War, and thereupon may receive a permit under the conditions with all the rights and privileges herein provided for streams or parts of streams used for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce in their ordinary, natural, or improved condition. Nothing in this section shall be construed to grant any right to occupy or use any public land.

Sections 7 and 10 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved September 19, 1890, and sections 9 and 10 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SHIELDS. The committee offers no objection to the amendment proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa has been accepted by the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. I read the amendment over hurriedly, and my recollection is that it says "streams or parts of streams used for interstate or foreign commerce." I wish to ask the Senator about a case like this: Take, for instance, the Columbia River. It is navigable up to Priest Rapids. Then come the rapids. Above that it could be navigated, but there is no interstate or foreign commerce on that part of the river, simply because of this obstruction. We want to get that obstruction removed, and that is a part of the river that is not now used for interstate or foreign commerce. Could we improve that under the language of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; the very moment that the improvement was determined upon or entered upon then it would fall within the general purview of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I merely wished to make that suggestion. Of course the matter can be looked into very carefully in conference. I am in favor of the general provision of the Senator's amendment and I would not want, and I know the Senator would not want, to exclude an improvement in a case like that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I do not exactly understand the purport of this amendment, but if I do understand it correctly I think it means to a certain extent the abandonment by the United States of its jurisdiction over certain portions of rivers which empty into navigable rivers or form a part thereof. If such is the purpose and intent I wish to record my objection to this amendment.

I do not believe that the Government ever has intended to utilize its waterways in the United States so as in any degree to abandon jurisdiction over those waters which it now has the right to exercise a jurisdiction, whether by a construction which might be placed upon this act or by interpretation given it defining the rights or the extent of a right which heretofore has been claimed to be somewhat in doubt. That is to say, even though we may not have the power by an act of Congress to abandon a constitutional jurisdiction, yet, as I understand it, an act of Congress may in a case involved in doubt be interpreted as having for its purpose the settling of that, and in a practical way find the facts, the exact limitations of which have not been precisely therefor defined, and in this method do something which in effect would curtail our authority and our jurisdiction over all the waters of the country.

I say if that is to be the case, and private rights are to be interjected between the reservoirs of rivers and the lower reaches or the navigable portion of our rivers, or if State rights are to be interjected so as to constitute an obstruction in the future to works which the United States may desire to undertake, then we might as well abandon any idea as to the future development of the waterways of the United States.

I referred yesterday in my argument here to the proposition of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], that some time the United States will have to make it its business to do work such as has been proposed by the bill of the Senator from Nevada, even though it may not be ready to do it now, and with that possibility in mind anything in the way of legislation that is going to make that difficult or impossible I think is ill-advised.

I, for one, feel that whatever water-power act is going to be put through Congress, if any, should be of such a character that in no event can it ever interfere legally or otherwise with the consummation of a great work which we will certainly find some day we will have to undertake or establish in this country.

I am afraid if we abandon temporarily, either directly or by innuendo, or leave the inference that we abandon the jurisdiction of the United States over any of these waters, there will be particular portions of the streams themselves navigable, whether these particular portions of the streams are navigable in a commercial sense or not, but which certainly must be an integral part of the system of waterways which makes it absolutely necessary that we keep control and jurisdiction over it.

Mr. President, I feel that this amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Has the amendment been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been. Objection was made by the Senator from Wisconsin, and it is necessary to take a vote on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have discussed this matter three or four times during the progress of the debate, and I intend to be very brief in my reference to it at this time.

If the Senator from Wisconsin believes that there is any effort here to abandon any part of the jurisdiction of Congress over the streams of the country, he is in error, as I view the bill. We could not abandon it if we would, and we ought not to abandon it if we could.

The amendment has for its principal object the limitation of the operation of the bill—I mean the general bill before the Senate—to those streams that are in fact navigable. With regard to all the other streams or parts of streams over which Congress has power under the constitutional provision there is no requirement that one who desires to build a dam shall come to the Secretary of War and be compelled to build it in the way and for the purposes which the Secretary of War might prescribe, but it is definitely and clearly stated that with respect to all such streams the obstructions which might be caused by the building of a dam shall be removed without expense to the United States whenever the Federal Government enters upon the stream for the purpose of improving it for navigable uses.

I may as well say here—and I think I ought to say it in order to be candid—that even if this amendment is added to the bill, and no others are added, I will not be able to support it. I can not support the bill unless the franchise or permission given to build dams in navigable streams ends at a definite period without further action upon the part of the Government; and I can not support such a bill so long as it contains provisions which I think require the United States to pay an unfair, unjust, and exaggerated value for the property that may be built up around the dam or dependent upon the dam for usefulness.

Nevertheless, I assume the bill will pass, and I am exceedingly anxious that the development of little streams in my own State that are under development now shall not be retarded, shall not be prevented by the provision of requirement that those who desire to put dams in them shall come to the Secretary of War and build these improvements not only with reference to the development of power but the development of navigation, even though it is perfectly well known that for 50 years to come, or longer perhaps, these streams or some of them will not be used and can not be used for purposes of commerce.

That is all I desire to say about the amendment I have offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHIELDS. Without reading it, I desire to place in the RECORD the definition of navigable streams as described in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE DANIEL BALL V. UNITED STATES (77 U. S., 557–566).

(Michigan Grand River.)

Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion for the court, said:

"Two questions are presented in this case for our determination.

"First, whether the steamer was at the time designated in the libel engaged in transporting merchandise and passengers on a navigable water of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress.

* * * * * * *

"Upon the first of these questions we entertain no doubt. The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test, as in England, or any test at all as to the navigability of waters. There no waters are navigable in fact, or at least to any considerable extent, which are not subject to the tide; and from this circumstance tidewater and navigable water there signify substantially the same thing. But in this country the case is widely different. Some of our rivers are as navigable for many hundred of miles above as they are below the limits of tidewater, and some of them are navigable for great distances by large vessels which are not even affected by the tide at any point during their entire length." (Genesee Chief, 12 How., 457; The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall., 555; 71 U. S., XVIII, 451.)

"A different test must therefore be applied to determine the navigability of our rivers, and that is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when they form, in their ordinary condition by themselves, or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water."

UNITED STATES V. THE MONTELLO, ETC. (87 U. S., 430–445).

Mr. Justice Davis delivered the opinion of the court:

"The question for decision in this case is whether the Fox River in Wisconsin is a navigable water of the United States. When the case was here before (11 Wall., 414; 78 U. S., XX, 192), the libel was defective and the evidence insufficient to determine the question, and it was remanded for further proceedings, to enable the parties by new allegations and evidence to present the exact character of Fox River as a navigable stream. This has been done, and there is therefore nothing in the way of a correct solution of the inquiry.

"This court held in the case of the Daniel Ball (10 Wall., 557; 77 U. S., XIX, 999), that those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And a river is a navigable water of the United States when it forms by itself, or by its connection with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water. (The Montello, 11 Wall., 411; 78 U. S., XX, 191.) Apply these tests to the case in hand, and we think the question must be answered in the affirmative."

UNITED STATES V. RIO GRANDE DAM AND IRRIGATION CO. (174 U. S. REPTS., 698–699).

The mere fact that logs, poles, and rafts are floated down a stream occasionally and in times of high water does not make it a navigable river. It was said in The Montello (20 Wall., 430, 439) "that those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways of commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water." And again, page 442, "It is not, however," as Chief Justice Shaw said (21 Pickering, 344), "every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high water which is deemed navigable, but in order to give it the character of a navigable stream it must be generally and commonly useful to some purpose of trade or agriculture."

Obviously the Rio Grande within the limits of New Mexico is not a stream over which, in its ordinary condition, trade and travel can be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. Its use for any purpose of transportation has been and is exceptional, and only in times of temporary high water. The ordinary flow of water is insufficient. It is not like the Fox River, which was considered in The Montello, in which was an abundant flow of water and a general capacity for navigation along its entire length; and although it was obstructed at certain places by rapids and rocks, yet these difficulties could be overcome by canals and locks, and when so overcome would leave the stream in its ordinary condition susceptible to use for general navigation purposes. We are not, therefore, disposed to question the conclusion reached by the trial court and the supreme court of the Territory that the Rio Grande within the limits of New Mexico is not navigable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. HUSTING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have offered several amendments to the bill. The principles involved in the various amendments I have presented have been passed on in other amendments, and I am not going to ask for any vote upon the various amendments save one. As to this amendment, I think the principle involved in it has not so far arisen in the debate or been presented in any amendment. Under the terms of the amendment as originally proposed I provide, on page 12, for the striking out of certain words after the word "for" in line 10. I wish to change that and have the proposed amendment follow the word "included" in line 14, page 12.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 7, page 12, line 14, following the word "included," insert:

The Secretary of War shall have the right to provide rules and regulations for uniform accounting, to examine all books and accounts of grantees under the terms of this act, to require them to submit statements, representations or reports, annual or special, including full information as to assets and liabilities, capitalization, cost of project, cost of operation, the production, use, transmission, and sale of power. All such statements, representations, and reports shall be upon oath unless otherwise specified, and in such form and on such blanks as the Secretaries may require, and any person making any false entry, statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to propose my substitute amendment at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes a substitute for the bill as amended. The Secretary will read the substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Terms used in this act are defined as follows:

First. "Commission" shall mean the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture, or any two of them, acting jointly as commissioners for the purposes of this act.

Second. "Navigable waters" shall include all waters whereon interstate or foreign commerce is, or can be wholly or in part, carried on by any method whatsoever, with or without transshipment and portage of goods and passengers, and including log driving and pleasure boating, as well as all other forms of transportation; also all other waters designated by lawful authority as suitable to be improved to that measure of commerce carrying capacity, with or without other objects in view.

Third. "Tributary waters" shall include all streams flowing or discharging into navigable waters.

Fourth. "Designated dam site" shall mean all lands under, in, and along navigable waters designated by the commission as necessary or useful for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a dam for the improvement of navigation and the development of hydraulic and hydroelectric power or for the improvement of navigation and for other purposes.

Fifth. "Designated power site" shall mean all lands, including such designated dam site, if any, which are located in, under, and along navigable waters and designated by the commission as suitable to be flooded by, or to be occupied and used for the construction, maintenance, and operation of reservoirs, dams, and other structures, works, or equipment necessary or convenient for improving navigation, and in connection therewith developing hydraulic or hydroelectric energy, and so located as, in the judgment of the commission, to secure the efficient improving of navigation and the complete utilization of the available flow of water, consistent with economic construction, development, and use for hydraulic or hydroelectric power.

Sixth. "Corporation," unless otherwise specified, shall mean a corporation organized under the laws of the State wherein lies the designated power site for which a license is sought by it under this act, and competent to carry on in such State the business of developing, transmitting, or distributing hydraulic or hydroelectric power, and all other business necessary to effect the purpose of the license; or if the designated power site lies in two or more States, a corporation organized under the laws of one of them and competent to carry on such business in each of them; or a corporation organized under the laws of the United States to carry out the purposes of this act. It shall not include a municipality as defined in this act.

Seventh. "Municipality" shall mean a city, county, irrigation district, or other political subdivision of a State competent under the laws thereof to carry on the business of commercial power development, transmission, or distribution.

Eighth. "State" shall include any organized territory of the United States on the Continent of North America.

Ninth. "License" shall mean a grant of authority by the commission under this act to construct, maintain, and operate a dam in or across navigable waters for the improvement of navigation and for the development of hydraulic or hydroelectric power for sale to the public or for the improvement of the navigation of navigable waters, and for other lawful purposes.

Tenth. "Licensee" shall mean the original recipient from the commission of a license under this act, or any subsequent lawful holder of such a license.

Eleventh. "Works" shall mean dams, storage, diverting and fore-bay reservoirs, conduits, power houses and other physical structures, machinery and equipment within a designated power site which are used and useful or appropriate for improving navigation and in connection therewith developing hydraulic or hydroelectric power.

SEC. 2. That the engineering duties imposed by this act upon the commission shall be performed, upon request of the commission to any one of the said Secretaries, by the engineers of his department and in conformity with the laws fixing, at the time of performance, the powers and duties of such engineers, respectively.

SEC. 3. (a) That the commission shall cause to be gathered, collected, and recorded all such information about navigable waters, river improvements, dam sites, and power sites, as they may deem necessary or useful for the purposes of this act: Provided, That such gathering, collection, and record is at the time otherwise authorized by law.

(b) That the commission shall investigate all existing dams in navigable waters and tributary waters having, as determined by the commission, at ordinary stage of water a capacity of 1,000 horsepower or more, and hydraulic or hydroelectric power generating or transmitting plants of like capacity within designated power sites, and, among other things, shall ascertain what authority is claimed or exists for the construction, operation, and maintenance of each. The commission shall report thereon to Congress from time to time, with such recommendations as they deem to be in the public interest.

(c) That the commission may, when practicable, secure the assistance and cooperation of States, municipalities, corporations as above defined, other corporations, associations, and individuals in the performance of its duties.

SEC. 4. (a) That the commission may, from time to time, locate and establish by metes and bounds or otherwise, and make record of, designated dam sites and designated power sites. Hereafter no dam shall be located or constructed in navigable waters at any place other than a designated dam site, or at any place where its maintenance would materially interfere with any other duly authorized dam.

(b) That hereafter no dam shall be built in navigable waters forming the boundary of two States, and no dam having at ordinary stage of water a capacity of 1,000 horsepower or more, shall be built in any navigable waters without the consent of Congress by special act, nor with such consent until thereafter licensed by the commission under this act. But this shall not apply to dams built by the Government in pursuance of general authority given by Congress: Provided, That dams heretofore authorized by a State legislature to be built in rivers navigable in but a single State, whereof the plans and specifications have not yet been approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, as required by law, shall be deemed, for the purposes of this act, to have received, at the date of this act, the consent of Congress in this subsection required, but shall in all other respects be subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. (a) That the maintenance and improvement of all navigable waters, and the construction, maintenance, or operation of dams now or hereafter constructed therein for any purpose whatsoever; also the construction, maintenance, and operation of all hydraulic or hydroelectric power generating or distributing works now or hereafter constructed within any designated power site shall be under the supervision of the commission. Such commission or any member thereof, or any person appointed by it for such purpose, shall at all times have free access to any and all parts of any such dam or power works, or of any other structures, works, or premises maintained in connection therewith.

(b) That the commission in the interest of navigation and of the public welfare and safety shall have power to regulate and control the level and flow of water in all navigable waters, and may order or require monuments or bench marks to be erected or may cause to be erected monuments or bench marks on which shall be designated the maximum and minimum level of water that may be maintained in any navigable waters by any dam whether constructed or maintained under this act or otherwise, and may order any unlawful encroachments to be removed. But nothing in this subsection shall affect any water right heretofore or hereafter duly acquired by appropriation beyond what may be necessary in the interest of navigation and public safety alone.

SEC. 6. (a) That the commission shall have power, authority, and jurisdiction to investigate, ascertain, and determine all reasonable methods of construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of any dam, hydraulic, or hydroelectric generating or distributing work or improvement so as to conserve and protect all public rights in navigable waters and designated power sites, promote the improvement of navigation, and protect life, health, and property. No dam shall be constructed until the location, plans, and specifications therefor have been approved by the commission, and the commission shall at any time, in the interest of public safety or public rights, order and require anything reasonably necessary therefor and within the authority of the Government of the United States to order. No license granted under this act shall limit the authority of the commission to protect and conserve all public rights. The commission shall have power to adopt and enforce all necessary and reasonable rules and regulations and prescribe all forms for the conduct of its business and for securing information as it may deem necessary or convenient for the administration of this act.

(b) That the owner of any dam heretofore or hereafter constructed in navigable waters shall keep and maintain the same and all duly required piers, booms, weirs, tunnels, races, flumes, sluices, pits, fishways, locks, boat hoists, marine railways, and other structures and works necessary for the improvement of navigation and for the proper maintenance of any dam or structure in good repair and condition, and shall not willfully or otherwise injure or destroy the same or any part thereof, or remove the same or any part thereof, unless such removal be first approved in writing by the commission.

(c) That except when emergency shall require for the protection of life, health, or property no substantial alterations or additions shall be made to any dam except dams of 1,000 horsepower or less on nonboundary line navigable waters without obtaining an order therefor from the commission. Such order shall be issued by the commission after an investigation and a finding that the proposed alterations or additions will not impair the efficiency or sufficiency of the dam.

SEC. 7. That upon receipt of information in writing from the proper authorities of any State or municipality that any dam, maintained in or across navigable waters, or any reservoir wholly or in part within a designated power site, is in an unsafe condition, or from any person that his property or any property under his control is endangered by such dam or reservoir, the commission may cause such dam or reservoir to be examined or the commission may, upon its own motion, examine or cause to be examined any dam or structure maintained in such waters or any such reservoir, and if it shall find that the same is not sufficiently strong to resist the pressure of water upon it, or if it shall find that any such dam or reservoir is in any manner unsafe and dangerous to life and property it shall determine what alteration, addition, or repairs are necessary to be made in order to make the same safe, and on notice and hearing may order the owner or person having control of such dam or reservoir to cause such additions, alterations, or repairs to be made within a time to be limited in such order; and the commission may, in case of emergency, without notice cause to be drawn off in whole or in part the water in such reservoir or impounded by such dam, when it shall determine that such action is necessary to prevent impending damage to persons or property.

SEC. 8. That all dams in or across navigable waters shall be constructed, equipped, maintained, and operated so as to conserve and protect the navigability of navigable waters and other public rights in such waters as the commission may deem necessary and so as not to endanger life, health, and property. Upon a finding of necessity therefor, the commission shall order and require any such dam to be equipped and provided as follows, according to the specifications made by the commission:

First. With a good and sufficient fishway or fishways.

Second. With spillways or floodgates capable of permitting the safe passage through, around, or over the same of freshets and floods during all seasons of the year.

Third. With booms, piers, or other protection works ample to safeguard from brush, timber, ice, or other floating material.

Fourth. With two permanent bench marks at every such dam marking the minimum and maximum height or head of water that may be maintained in accordance with the license authorizing the construction and maintenance thereof.

Fifth. With slides and chutes for the passage of logs and timber products.

Sixth. If such waters are navigable for commercial or pleasure boats and crafts, with a lock, boat hoist, marine railway, or other devices of a size and construction sufficient to accommodate such navigation: Provided, That the equipment named and described in subsections (e) and (f) last before written shall be at the expense of the United States, except in so far as specifically required by the commission as a condition when approving and issuing the license.

SEC. 9. That for the purpose of defraying the expense of inspecting and supervising dams in navigable waters and of acquiring, constructing, and maintaining reservoirs and other works for the improvement of navigation, every owner of a dam now or hereafter constructed in and across navigable waters, except States and municipalities, and except as to dams constructed by the United States or constructed under or in connection with leases or permits from the proper department or officer of the United States for the development of hydraulic or hydroelectric power, wholly or in part on land of the United States, shall pay to the commission an annual charge in July of each year for 30 years after the license becomes effective of not less than 10 cents per theoretical horsepower capacity of such dam at ordinary stages of water as ascertained by the commission. All proceeds of such fees shall be paid into the Treasury and shall constitute a special fund which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended as the commission may direct for the purpose specified in this section.

SEC. 10. (a) That no person, firm, association of individuals, corporation as hereinbefore defined, other corporation, municipality, or State shall construct, maintain, operate, or use any dam in or across any navigable waters from and after six months after the passage of this act, without authority of law, or without legislative permission heretofore granted, or without obtaining a license as hereinafter provided, authorizing such maintenance, operation, and use.

(b) That any dam constructed, maintained, operated, or used in violation of the provisions of this section is hereby declared to be a public nuisance, and such use may be enjoined or its maintenance abated at the suit of the United States and the Attorney General is authorized to institute proper proceedings therefor upon request of the commission. The provisions of this subsection shall not, however, apply to any dam constructed under a license granted under this act during the continuance of the license.

SEC. 11. (a) That licenses under this act authorizing the construction, maintenance, and operation of any dam in boundary line navigable waters or a dam or other structure in navigable waters where, as determined by the commission, there may be developed at ordinary stage of water more than 1,000 horsepower of hydraulic or hydroelectric power, may be granted only to States, municipalities, or public-service corporations, and for the purpose of improving the navigation of navigable waters and of developing hydraulic or hydroelectric power for sale to the public: Provided, That preference shall be given to States and municipalities.

(b) That authority for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams or other structures in nonboundary line navigable waters where, as determined by the commission, there can not be developed at ordinary stage of water more than 1,000 horsepower of hydraulic or hydroelectric power, may be granted by any State to any municipality, corporation, or person for the purpose of improving the navigation of navigable waters, and for such purpose together with any other lawful purpose, subject, however, to such general rules, regulations, and conditions as the commission may prescribe for safeguarding and promoting navigation, for the protection of all public rights therein, and for public safety: Provided, That preference shall be given to municipalities.

SEC. 12. That every license granted pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be accepted, taken, and held subject to the terms, provisions, and conditions of this act applicable thereto and of such license, and shall be so accepted, taken, and held in consideration of the powers, privileges, and prerogatives conferred by this act and by such license.

SEC. 13. (a) That any State, municipality, or corporation as hereinbefore defined, desiring to secure a license under this act for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a dam or other structure as set forth in subsection (a) of section 11 of this act, and for the purpose therein mentioned, shall, after obtaining the consent of Congress by special act, apply to the commission in writing, setting forth the following:

1. If the applicant is a municipality or a corporation, due proofs of its corporate powers and authority to receive, use, and enjoy the license.

2. The name of the navigable waters sought to be improved and a description of the power site suggested for designation under this act in connection therewith and satisfactory evidence that the applicant will acquire title to all lands not owned by the United States within the power site, to be held subject to the provisions of this section.

3. The extent to which the navigation of such waters will be improved and the nature, scope, and manner of making the proposed improvement.

4. The names, as far as ascertainable, of all riparian owners who will be affected by the proposed improvement, also a description of lands of the United States and of any State that will be so affected.

5. A general description of the dam proposed to be constructed, of the material to be used therein, of all booms, piers, and other protection works to be constructed in connection therewith, and a particular description of the proposed designated dam site.

6. The name of the nearest city or village above and below the site of the proposed dam.

7. The location of the nearest existing dam above and below the site of the proposed dam, and the extent, if any, to which the same will be affected by the proposed improvement.

8. A map of the proposed designated power site on a scale of not less than 4 inches to the mile, showing the lands that may be affected by the construction, maintenance, and operation of the proposed dam or by any flowage that may be caused thereby and approximately the outline of such flowage.

9. The approximate amount of hydraulic and hydroelectric power that is proposed to be developed and generated and a description of the territory within which such power is proposed to be sold.

10. Such additional information as the commission may require.

(b) In addition to the foregoing, such application shall be accompanied by the following proposals:

1. To install and maintain a complete system of accounting as prescribed from time to time by the commission, and to authorize and empower the commission to audit all revenues and to approve prior to the expenditure thereof all outlays for property, except that acquired under section 19, and all outlays for the construction of the dam, buildings, and other structures and works constructed, maintained, and operated and used and useful under the license applied for.

Second. To fully develop the available water power at the dam site, and to install auxiliary power upon a finding of convenience and necessity therefor by the commission; that every contract entered into by the licensee with any person, firm, or corporation, private or public, for the sale or delivery of power developed by any dam licensed under this act and generated in connection with such dam, shall expire not more than 30 years from the date upon which the license became effective and in force.

Third. That the commission shall, before the license is granted, designate the dam site and power site, and shall value the power site exclusive of any rights of water power or the use of water power whether such power site is owned by the applicant or not; but lands of the United States, if any, shall not be included in such valuation.

Fourth. No such license shall be granted for a longer term than 30 years, but the licensee shall have the right of renewal of such license for two further and successive terms of 10 years each upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be agreed upon or may be fixed by the commission.

Fifth. Upon expiry of the license the works and the lands of the license within the designated power site shall become the property of the United States upon payment for the lands at the prices approved by the commission under section 16, and for the works at a reasonable price to be fixed by the commission as of the time of such expiry: Provided, That in the event that Congress fails to make the necessary appropriation for such payment, the commission may renew the license to the then licensee upon terms and conditions to be fixed by the commission, or the commission may issue a license to a new licensee upon terms and conditions then so fixed and upon such new licensee's paying for such lands and works at the prices so approved and fixed by the commission: Provided, however, That no renewal of licenses, or new licenses, shall be for a longer period than that herein limited for initial licenses.

SEC. 14. That the licensee, the holders of stocks and bonds to be issued by such licensee, and all creditors and others in interest shall be bound by the proposals, consent, and undertakings of the applicants as so set forth.

SEC. 15. (a) That upon receipt of an application under section 13, the commission may, in its discretion, order a public hearing thereon at such time and place, upon such notice and before such officer or officers of the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, or all or any members of the commission, as the commission may order. The commission shall provide for the representation of the interests of the United States at such and all subsequent hearings by competent and proper officers of any or all of the said departments. Notice shall be given by the commission to the governor of each State wherein lies any part of the power site proposed to be designated.

(b) That the application may be considered at such hearing or any adjournment thereof, and evidence taken in support thereof or in opposition thereto.

(c) That the commission shall investigate by such hearings, if any, and otherwise, all matters pertaining to such application and the proposed license and may require that the application be amended in such manner as they deem best to carry out the purposes of this act and safeguard the interests and rights of the United States, the State or municipality or corporation, and the public.

(d) That if the commission shall determine that the granting of a license pursuant to the original or amended application will result in the improvement of navigation, will promote and safeguard the interests and rights of the United States, the State, the municipality or corporation, and the public, the commission shall so find, and shall designate the dam site and power site and such finding shall be deemed and taken to be a license containing the provisions of such original or amended application, and shall take effect upon the filing with the commission, in such form as it may prescribe, of a wrtten acceptance thereof by the applicant. The commission shall issue to the applicant a certificate evidencing the authority conferred by the license.

SEC. 16. That the price to be paid by the licensee for any property acquired and used under the license, except that acquired by condemnation, if any, and the price to be paid for any construction work under the license shall be reasonable, and shall be subject to the approval of the commission: Provided, That the commission shall approve the prices fixed by the courts in condemnation proceedings: Provided further, That in such condemnation proceedings the Attorney General may intervene to protect public interests against the payment of an unreasonable price.

SEC. 17. (a) That all licenses granted to corporations as herein defined are granted subject to the right of the United States, or any State or municipality duly authorized thereto, upon at least one year's notice thereof, at any time prior to the expiration of 50 years from the date when the license becomes effective, to acquire all of the property of the licensee constructed or maintained and used and useful in carrying out the purposes for which such license was granted, by paying just compensation therefor as determined by the commission at the time of taking: Provided, That in ascertaining what is just compensation for any such property taken under such subsection no allowance shall be made for the value of any license granted under this act.

(b) That if the United States or a State or municipality exercises its option to acquire the property of a corporation operating under a license granted under this act, then and in such case the United States, the State, or municipality, as the case may be, shall give a preferential right of service to those using water power or electric power developed or generated by the corporation at the time of such acquisition, and the service to such persons shall be continued upon such terms and for such period of time as may be found reasonable by the commission, but in no case shall such preferential right continue for a period longer than 10 years from the date of acquisition by the United States, State, or municipality under this section.

(c) That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as conferring, creating, or admitting on the part of the United States the existence of any private property as to navigable waters or the use of navigable waters in the owners of lands riparian thereto, nor as requiring the United States or any licensee under this act or any other authorized agent of the United States to pay any compensation at any time for navigable water or the use of navigable water taken or used under this act, or to pay any compensation on account of any value which any land riparian to navigable water may have by reason of its availability in connection with water power or the use of water power if such water or the use thereof is required or taken for the purposes contemplated in this act.

SEC. 18. (a) That no transfer or assignment of any license granted under this act shall be valid or of any effect whatsoever unless the same shall have been submitted in writing to and approved in writing by the commission. No license granted hereunder shall be transferred or assigned to anyone except a qualified licensee under this act; nor shall any license granted hereunder to a State or municipality be assigned or transferred to any person, firm, or corporation otherwise than as security for a loan made in good faith and concurrently with and as consideration for such transfer or assignment, nor shall any person, firm, or corporation have power to acquire title to a license granted to or acquired by a State or municipality otherwise than in the enforcement of such security; and in on case shall any such person, firm, or corporation hold title to or operate for a period longer than three years any license so acquired.

(b) That no State or municipality shall make or execute any lease or any contract with any person, firm, or corporation for the sale or use of hydraulic or hydroelectric power developed or generated by such State or municipality under a license granted under this act for longer than a period of 15 years, nor unless the same shall be first approved by the commission.

SEC. 19. That any licensee under this act may acquire the right to use or damage any private lands or property necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any dam or works within the designated power site by condemnation in the district court of the United States for the district in which the lands are located or in the State courts. The practice and procedure in the United States courts under this section shall conform, as nearly as may be, with the practice and procedure in like cases in the State courts: Provided, That compensation awarded in any condemnation proceeding under this section shall be in accord with the principles expressed in subsection (a) of section 17.

SEC. 20. That if any improvement, maintained under any license granted pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever so that the same form part of or in any way effect any combination, or shall be in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy to limit the output of any hydraulic or hydroelectric power derived therefrom, or in any manner or degree in restraint of trade in the generation, sale, or distribution of hydraulic or hydroelectric power derived therefrom, the United States may take possession by appropriate proceedings wherein the members of the commission shall be appointed to act as receivers during such period as the court may determine.

SEC. 21. (a) That no license granted under this act shall become effective and in force unless within 90 days after notice from the commission that the same has been granted, the licensee shall file with the commission a written acceptance thereof.

(b) That any license granted under this act shall be null and void unless the dam and works thereby authorized to be constructed be completed within three years from the time when such license becomes effective and in force. The commission may, however, upon good cause being shown, extend such time for an additional period of two years.

SEC. 22. (a) That any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the terms, provisions, or conditions of this act, or any rules or regulations duly made thereunder, or any order of the commission made pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall forfeit for each such violation not more than $2,000.

(b) That the forfeitures provided for in this act shall be payable into the Treasury and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States brought by the Attorney General or any United States attorney in any court of competent jurisdiction within the State wherein the designated power site or any part thereof is located.

SEC. 23. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to exempt or release any person, firm, or corporation owning or operating any dam and appurtenant works under the provisions hereof from any common law or statutory liability for damages resulting from or growing out of the construction, maintenance, or operation of such dam or works, or as in any manner affecting such liability of any person, firm, or corporation, or as in any manner creating any liability on the part of the United States for damages resulting from or growing out of the construction, maintenance, or operation of any dam not owned by the United States.

SEC. 24. That whenever in the opinion of the President of the United States, evidenced by a written order addressed to the holder of any franchise, permit, or lease hereunder that the safety of the country demands, the United States hereby reserves the right to enter upon and take possession of any power plant developed under a permit, lease, or franchise held under the provisions of this act, for the purpose of the manufacture of nitrates, explosives, or for any other purpose concerning the safety of the country and retain possession, management, and control thereof for such length of time as may appear to the President to be necessary to accomplish the said purposes, and then to restore possession and control to the party or parties entitled thereto: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the party or parties entitled thereto such fair and just compensation for the use of said property, calculated upon the basis of a normal, fair, and moderate profit in time of peace, as may be agreed upon between the licensee and the commission: Provided further, That such fair and just compensation shall not be in excess of a sum which will hold the party entitled to such compensation harmless of any loss or damage or damages by reason of such taking over, holding, using, and the restoring of the said properties in substantially the same condition as at the time of the taking thereof to the party or parties entitled thereto.

SEC. 25. That all charges and rates for and service of hydraulic and hydroelectric power made or rendered by the licensee or by any seller or distributor taking such power from the licensee shall be subject to regulation by the State commission or other authorized agency of the State wherein the service is rendered. And in the event that any State shall not have provided a commission or other authority for the regulation and control of such charges, rates, and services, such regulation within such State shall be made and enforced by the commission: Provided, That all charges, rates, and services by the grantee hereunder shall be nondiscriminatory, reasonable, and adequate to the public in view of the cost of production; and in computing such cost of production there shall be taken, first, the actual cost at the prices approved by the commission under section 10 for lands or interests in lands within the designated power site purchased and used by the licensee in the generation and distribution of power, and the actual cost paid in good faith for other lands or interests in lands purchased and used by the licensee in the generation and distribution of power; second, the actual cost to the grantee of a lock or locks or other aids to navigation required by the United States; third, the fair value of all other property of the grantee necessary or useful for the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, including property beyond the initial point of distribution. Such actual cost and fair value shall be determined by agreement between the commission and the grantee, and in the event of their failure to agree, then by said regulating authority. In determining the fair value of the property other than lands or interests in lands, allowance shall be made for deterioration, if any, of the existing structures, transmission lines, and distribution system, and no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted, for good will, going concern, profit in pending contracts for electrical energy, or for other conditions of current or prospective business, or for any other intangible element.

SEC. 26. That licenses granted under the foregoing provisions of this act and authorization by States under subsection (b) of section 11 shall affect only the jurisdictional interest of the United States in navigable waters, and nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the occupancy or use of any lands owned by the United States except as otherwise authorized by law.

SEC. 27. That the commission is hereby authorized, in its discretion, to lease, for the development of hydraulic and hydroelectric power, any lands of the United States at the sites of dams and works constructed wholly or in part by the United States in the interests of navigation, together with the right to use surplus water disposable by the United States and not deemed by the commission from time to time necessary for navigation. Such leases of lands and water rights shall be at such rates, on such terms and conditions, and for such periods of time, not to exceed 50 years, and with such provision for the periodical readjustment of rentals as may seem to the commission just, equitable, and expedient, subject, however, to the provisions of this act governing licenses and the use and disposition of power so far as the same may be applicable, and all such leases, the parties thereto, and the terms and conditions thereof shall be reported annually to Congress.

SEC. 28. That all appropriations heretofore or hereafter made to be expended by or under the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of Agriculture for any of the purposes of this act shall be available to be expended by them, respectively, and for said purposes, respectively, upon the order of commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the substitute now offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], after five weeks' discussion of the bill, is so absolutely different from it in every respect that the committee, of course, objects to it, and, unless further discussion of the amendment is desired, I ask that it may be voted on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I raise the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clark, Wyo.	Harding	Johnson, S. Dak.
Bankhead	Clarke, Ark.	Hardwick	Jones
Beckham	Colt	Hollis	Kenyon
Broussard	Cummins	Hughes	La Follette
Chamberlain	du Pont	Husting	Lane
Chilton	Gronna	James	Lea, Tenn.
Lodge	Page	Shields	Sutherland
McCumber	Pittman	Smith, Ariz.	Thompson
Martine, N. J.	Poindexter	Smith, Ga.	Tillman
Nelson	Pomerene	Smith, Md.	Wadsworth
Norris	Ransdell	Smith, Mich.	Walsh
Oliver	Reed	Smoot	Warren
Overman	Shafroth	Sterling	Williams
Owen	Sheppard	Stone	Works

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of serious illness in his family. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. STONE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I argued this matter at length yesterday, and I have no disposition to reargue it. For the information of Senators who were not present yesterday when this matter was discussed, however, I desire to point out very briefly the objections to the committee bill, and very briefly the general provisions of the substitute bill offered by me, which, I think, are nearly the opposite of the committee bill.

I am opposed to the committee bill, first, for the reason that it provides for no charge of any kind; secondly, because, while it purports to limit the franchise to 50 years, in effect it is a perpetual franchise—perpetual because of the conditions annexed to the recapture, which makes it improbable, if not impossible, that the United States could take it back unless it wants to go into the business of transmitting power, heat, and light. In fact, the conditions are so onerous that they practically nullify the privilege. Furthermore, the recapture provisions are of such a nature that they, in effect, amount to nothing. These give no new privilege. These merely recognize the privilege that the United States or a State has to take by condemnation and pay the price fixed by a court or jury. While these purport to give the United States the privilege to take over, as I say, they add nothing to the privilege which may be ours any time we determine to enjoy it, because when the United States wants to go into the transportation business or the business of transmitting light, heat, and power it can always do so by passing the proper law and by condemning the property and taking it and paying the price that courts ordinarily fix in condemnation cases.

This bill instead of fixing the contract price now leaves it up in the air, and instead of concluding and making definite this contract the bill merely says that at the end of the period we may take it over for a price that we would be obliged to pay in condemnation cases; whereas we could, if we wanted to, fix at the present time the conditions of recapture, so that it would not need to be left for any court or jury to determine. Courts and juries in condemnation proceedings must necessarily pass upon the value of property that is seized, and a fair price must be paid for it; but there would be nothing left for a court or a jury to determine if in issuing the license the conditions of the contract were put in the license.

I am opposed to the committee bill further because, while it purports to control rates, it in effect leaves the control of rates in the States, which may or may not have a commission or other body to control the rates. In fact, according to the statement of Secretary Lane, there are only 12 States that control or fix the rates of public-service corporations; so that as to the rest of the States where there are no commissions in existence to fix these rates—36 of them, I am told—the people of the United States are entirely without protection.

So, in fact, this bill does not regulate rates. It merely says that they may be regulated by the States when they get ready to do it, and in so far as they are not ready there is no regulation. In fact, in the main the United States may not regulate rates at all. This the States can do without permission from the United States, because each State can pass its own laws and regulate any public service within that State. So this law adds nothing to that; and the claim that this measure is to take care of the interests of the ultimate consumer falls to the ground, because it leaves this function to the States, which can do it anyway, and only in case the States can not agree does this bill provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take charge of the matter.

It further provides that Government-owned dams shall be under the same provisions of recapture as those authorized under this bill; in fact, the dams built and paid for by the United States are practically subject to the same provisions as those dams paid for by private capital. In other words, it provides that if the United States contracts and expends its money for a dam, and permits third parties to come in and take possession of that dam and water power, and merge it or hook it up with their own private business, the United States can not get back the property for which it gave the permit without buying all the property with which it may become merged or to which it is connected. In other words, the United States can not take it unless it takes all the transmission lines. That means that dams already operated, already owned, or which will be constructed and owned in the future by the United States shall be put in such a position that they also can be tacked to a perpetual franchise, and we can not get our power back again without buying the business of those to whom we have surrendered our valuable property.

Not only that: This bill provides that those who have already made contracts with the United States, and who are now in possession of licenses, may come before the Secretary of War, surrender their old licenses, and take out new licenses under this bill. So, no matter how advantageous the terms may be for the United States under which they are now operating, the United States will surrender those advantageous licenses, and in lieu thereof issue a new license which provides nothing for protection of the people of the country and nothing to protect the interests of the United States.

There is nothing in the way of rate making or rate control in the bill which is definite or certain. Everyone knows that you can not control rates unless you have a physical valuation at the bottom of it. If you have nothing upon which to compute a rate, your rate making does not amount to anything; and under this bill valuations can be made as they will, or not made at all. Instead of having an accounting as to the value of the land or proposed improvement made before the license is issued, and a show-down as to what the cost is going to be, the question of value is left up in the air; and no doubt licensee will be permitted to compute his rates upon whatever valuation it may make, with all its speculative values, and the rate making will be based upon such figures as it may make and present to the rate-making power.

Not only that, but section 13, which purports to give the right of amendment, alteration, or repeal, only applies to this act, which, of course, can be amended or repealed at any time; but it is careful to provide that any action of the licensee under this act will vest in him certain rights that can not be altered, amended, or repealed. In other words, while you can amend the act you can not amend the license, and rights that are vested under the licenses given by the United States can not be changed by law; and for that reason the bill will substantially vest in perpetuity any license that is issued to the licensee.

Not only that, but while this purports to be a law primarily for the benefit of municipalities, primarily for the benefit of the States, and primarily for the benefit of the United States, there is in effect no preference to municipalities in this bill. It puts a municipality on the same plane as a public-service corporation; and in view of that, can there be any doubt what will happen? While councils are taking under consideration the advisability of taking out a license, any public-service corporation can go in there and get it. If any State wants to take out a license, of course, any public-service corporation can step in and take it and get ahead of the State, and the bill provides that they shall have first choice.

Not only that, but under this bill licenses are to be issued not only to those I have named, but to individuals and private corporations for their own benefit. This bill leaves the individual or the private corporation absolutely without any restriction, absolutely without any authority or control by the United States, by the State, or by any municipality, either over his dam or over his charges of any kind, or of any authority or control over the use to which his power may be put.

In other words, under this bill any individual or private corporation can go and condemn property and take it and keep it, not only for 50 years but forever, unless the United States chooses to pay for a plant that is hooked up with it. Under the provisions of this bill it makes the power private property. I repeat the power is private property, and the owner can manufacture commodities of any kind, and the United States does not reserve any right to control either the price, the product, or the use of the water, even though the people may need it and ought to have the use of it. While it purports to be, as I say, a bill for the benefit of the United States, the State municipalities, in my judgment it is a bill that can only have one end and that is to turn the water powers of this country into the hands of private individuals, private corporations, and public utilities for private use and profit.

The tendency of interlocking these interests is shown by that diagram. Everybody knows it; in fact, it is conceded, and there is no need to demonstrate it. I say that this bill is framed in such a way and in such terms that it does not require any imagination at all to feel certain that 50 years from now all the water powers in this country, all the hydroelectric powers in this country, will be in the hands of perhaps only one, at least in the hands of only private citizens and corporations, and these interests will practically have in the hollow of their hands the industrial and economic welfare of this country.

That is the reason why I am opposed to the committee bill. On the other hand, the amendment that I propose provides for an absolute 50-year franchise that shall be cut off at the end of 50 years. It may be renewed to that corporation or to another; but the measure is framed so that it automatically vests in the United States, subject only to an appropriation to pay for it if the United States then sees fit to make it, and if the United States sees fit to appropriate the money, what does it pay? It pays the cost of the land and the value of the improvement at the time of taking it over. The cost of the land and the cost of construction are in the hands of the commission before the license is issued. The commission consists of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of the Interior. Before the dam can be built the plans and specifications and the figures as to the cost of the plant and of the land are in the hands of the commission, so that for purposes of rate making the facts are before it and the rates can be made upon known and ascertained facts. Not only that, but it will cut out the unearned increment and will cut out speculative values or the watering of water stock. Not only for rate making will the cost be ascertained, but for purposes of recapture. The United States knows what it will have to pay for the land, and the value of the improvements can be ascertained by the commission.

So that we have a 50-year franchise, we have a commission to perform the duties of this office, and we have a termination of the lease. We provide here that this permit is a contract; that when this contract is accepted it is accepted with all the terms and conditions; and not only that, but we have a check on the right of assignment, because we make it subject to approval by the commission. Under the committee bill there is absolutely no check on assignment of franchises, and consequently there is nothing to prevent a tieing together such combinations of power.

The substitute offered by me provides for a fixed term of 30 years, with the option of two additional periods of 10 years each.

It provides further for the payment by the licensee of a charge of not less than 10 cents per horsepower, the commission in each instance to fix the charge at that or a higher amount. At the expiration of the 30-year period there may be a readjustment of the charge by the commission, and at the end of the first 10 years after the first 30-year period the commission may again adjust the charge to be paid by the owner or holder of the license.

Here, then, in this proposed substitute bill, there is a check on it to prevent—to prohibit—an undue or unwise enlargement of these combinations. Not only that, but if it shall appear that the great valuable water powers may fall into the hands of a few combinations, the substitute provides that the United States Congress can check it. I have not touched on all of the important features of the substitute, but most of these are the main features, the essential things, in the substitute, and that are recognized by those who have given this matter any attention as the essential features of a proper water-power bill.

I wish to mention merely one more matter which I forgot to mention yesterday. Whenever in the opinion of the President of the United States, evidenced by a written order, we need this water power in time of war, or probable war, the United States may, if it sees fit, step in and take possession of these water powers and use them in the national defense, and in advance of the need provide against being held up in time of stress and against the payment of war profits.

Mr. President, this is a provision which is merely precautionary, a provision put there for the purpose of accomplishing things that we may sometimes feel the need to accomplish; of accomplishing by a stroke of the pen something, as a matter of right, that may be of incalculable value to this country when, if ever, the need is here.

We are engaged now in trying to pass preparedness measures. In the preparedness scheme there is the necessity of building battleships and manufacturing armor and buying powder and ammunition. We must deal on the basis of the men who control the factories and can fix the price. Here is a provision which will forever secure to the United States a ready means to manufacture its own explosives if it desires to procure its ammunition in a manner and at a price which will, and at best may, prove of immeasurable value.

What objection can any Senator have to that? Not only that, but the United States can without any proceedings whatever in a summary way take these plants over.

Reverting now to the substitute, which is now to be put to a vote, it does seem to me, Mr. President, that it should be adopted. It should be adopted because it is framed in the interests of the people, not in the interests of water-power developers. The committee bill as framed on its face, whatever the intention may be, is a matter calculated to satisfy the demands only of the water-power developers, and it takes no care of the people's interest in this great resource. There is not one thing that is in the committee's bill that amounts to anything in taking care of the public interest in these potential water powers and streams. It is formed upon the theory that they must be developed at any cost to the people's interest, and even when it is doing that it is not insuring development. There is no guarantee in the bill, if passed, that we shall have water-power development. In fact, Mr. President, we shall not have the development until there is a market for the power that is going to be used. We have now in a number of States, according to the report of the Agricultural Department, overdevelopment of water power, and in those States there will be no further development until the demand catches up with the supply and passes it. Then we shall have development, and only then.

The committee bill gives them everything and the people nothing. The substitute which I have proposed gives the people at least something, not all that they ought to have, but at least a portion of what they are entitled to, and not only that, but it leaves the control of the power itself with the United States and within the hands of the people, and no matter what mistakes there might be in this amendment when the 50 years are over, at least time will cure the mistake. But time will never cure the mistakes if the bill proposed by the committee is passed, because these mistakes are not only irremediable but fatal. It contains the last word, practically, on the subject which the people can or will ever have the opportunity to speak.

We can do as we please about these things. I presume we have the power to do it. We can waive these rights, ignore them, give them away, throw them away; but the people are entitled at least to know when thrown away that those who are helping to throw them away do it advisedly, with full knowledge of what it means, and do it nevertheless and notwithstanding that they are fully aware what it means or may mean to the people of our country and to posterity. However, I say that no one who has his eyes open and looks but a short distance into the future can fail to realize that in throwing these away, that in cutting the tie that binds this power to us, and that in letting go of our jurisdiction and in letting this great resource slip out of the hands of the people, they are losing the most potent power, the most effective instrument for economic and industrial development ever placed in the hands of a people; we are losing the most potent power and instrument for good or evil ever tossed away by the representatives of a great people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be offered to the substitute, the question is, Shall the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] be adopted?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and withhold my vote in his absence.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He being absent from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. Inasmuch as he would vote, as I am informed, on this question as I am about to vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I understand that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am informed by the colleague of my pair that if he were present he would vote the same as I would on this question. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. Notwithstanding I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] I am privileged to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. HARDWICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (after having voted in the negative). I discover that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Gore	Kenyon	Martine, N. J.	Reed
Hollis	La Follette	Newlands
Husting	Lane	Norris
James	Lea, Tenn.	Poindexter

NAYS—44.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Page	Smoot
Bankhead	Hughes	Pittman	Stone
Beckham	Jones	Pomerene	Sutherland
Borah	Lodge	Ransdell	Swanson
Clapp	McCumber	Shafroth	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Sheppard	Tillman

Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Saulsbury	Weeks
Culberson	Kern	Sherman

So Mr. HUSTING's substitute was rejected.

Mr. WORKS. I ask that the amendment I have proposed be now laid before the Senate, and I move its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California has a pending amendment to the original bill.

Mr. WORKS. Offered as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to allow any municipal or private utility corporation to construct and maintain, in any actual navigable stream useful for transportation and commerce, a dam or other structure for the impounding and diversion of the waters of such stream or the development of power, or both, for public use, and to issue a permit therefor under such rules, regulations, and conditions as may be necessary to protect and preserve the navigability of such stream to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That such permit shall not be issued to any such corporation until it shall first have acquired the right, under the laws of the State in which the dam is to be located, to construct such dam and use the waters of such stream for beneficial purposes and the disposition of such water or power shall be regulated and controlled by the State; and the rates therefor to consumers shall be regulated and controlled by the State authorities: Provided, That if the water or power shall be distributed in two or more States, the rates to be charged therefor shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SEC. 3. That if it shall be necessary for such corporation to acquire any of the public lands in order to make the dam or other structures available for the purposes for which such permit is granted, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell so much of the public lands as may be necessary and available for such purpose, at a price to be agreed upon between them; and if the price can not be agreed upon, then such corporation is given the right to bring suit in any court having jurisdiction against the United States to condemn such lands for the uses and purposes covered by such permit.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to permit municipal and private utility corporations to construct dams and other structures in navigable streams for the purpose of diverting water from such streams and the development of power."

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from California proceeds, the Chair desires to make an announcement in connection with the pendency of the substitute. The more regular course would have been to have proposed it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING]. The Chair was not advised that it was pending and it did not take that course. For that reason the Chair does not suppose that the Senator from California should not have an opportunity to invite the judgment of the Senate as to whether his substitute shall be adopted or not. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, my position has been throughout that the Secretary of War has no jurisdiction to deal with this question except in so far as it affects navigation, and that no such power or jurisdiction can be imposed upon him by Congress. The Government has no interest in the development of power. That is a matter which rests entirely with the States. The only jurisdiction that the Government has over the streams in the States is to promote and protect navigation. It has no right to the use of the stream for any other purpose. It can not confer that right upon anyone else, directly or indirectly. The argument which has been made here in support of proposed amendments that the Government should have some compensation for the interest it has in these power plants and the development of power is entirely beside the question for the simple reason that the Government has no such interest to protect.

In this very simple substitute I have provided that the Secretary of War may grant a permit to any municipal or other utility corporation to construct a dam in the stream, and that he may impose any conditions which may seem necessary to him to promote and protect navigation. That is just as far as he has any right to go, in my judgment. He has no right to impose any condition that affects the use of the water for power purposes. That is a matter which rests with the States.

I have provided that before the construction of the dam by any corporation it must first have the consent of the State that has a right to control the construction of the dam or the use of the water in a navigable stream just the same as in one that is not navigable. If the Government desires to promote navigation or to construct any dam in the stream for that purpose it has a perfect right to do so. It does not have to ask permission of the States to do anything of that sort, but when it proposes to authorize some private corporation to construct a dam in the stream for the purpose of developing power, then the matter comes within the jurisdiction of the State, and consent should be given by the State before any dam should be constructed for any such purpose.

The Government in justice has a right to receive a reasonable compensation for any of the public lands that may be used for this purpose. Therefore I have provided in the amendment that, if any such lands are needed, the Secretary of the Interior, who has control over the public lands, may sell the land to the corporation if a price can be agreed upon, and if not, that then the corporation may bring its action to condemn the land the same as a private individual and against the National Government.

The friends of this bill claim that it has two objects in which they are interested. One is to promote and improve navigation; the other to bring about the development of power. The bill is not going to accomplish anything worth while so far as the improvement of navigation is concerned. The real object the bill has, the real object that is in the minds of the friends of the bill, is to bring about the construction of power plants and the development of power. The mode that I have provided for in the amendment I now propose is the simplest means of reaching that object. It will do more to bring about the development of power and do it more speedily than any legislation that has been offered here up to this time.

If I believed that the Government was giving away any property that belongs to it, I should insist, as other Senators do, that the Government should be compensated for whatever of its property is taken. I insist, Mr. President, that the Government has no interest in the waters of these streams whatever for the purpose of developing power. It has no interest in it except for purposes of navigation, and the bill I offer does not propose in any way to interfere with or obstruct navigation but to promote it. Therefore it is not in antagonism to any rights of the United States. It could not by any possibility have the effect of depriving the Government of any of its rights or any further interest it has unless it is proposed in connection with it to take public lands, and I have provided in that case that the Government shall be paid and the means by which the value of the land shall be arrived at.

I make a further provision, but I think it is hardly necessary, because it is the law now. It is necessarily so under the Constitution of the United States. I provide that within the States they shall have power to govern and control the rates to be charged; but if it becomes interstate business that then the rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I appeal to Senators to know what more can be asked, what more is necessary in order to bring about the very object which is sought through this legislation?

Mr. President, the chief argument against it, as far as I have heard it mentioned here by Senators who are familiar with this question and know what the effect of it will be, is that legislation of this kind can not pass the House. That is not a very forceful argument against a just and fair piece of legislation. I think we ought not to assume, if this is the right sort of legislation, that the House will oppose it.

Mr. President, I have discussed the general features of the pending bill. I have tried to point out my objections to it that I think are vital. I think it is an unwarranted attempt to take over the power of the States and to interfere with their sovereignty over what in our section of the country is one of the greatest and most important rights and interests, namely, the control and flow and use of the waters of these streams.

I am not going to go into any further discussion of the merits of the bill. I only desired to explain in this brief way what I am seeking to do by the amendment I have proposed. I am just as much in favor of developing power as any other Senator can possibly be. I am not objecting to the bill that is now pending before the Senate, because I do not want to see power developed. I am glad to help to bring it about in any way I can; but my own judgment about it is that the bill that is pending will not only not promote the development of power but it will be an obstruction to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is a very logical statement of his contention, namely, that the United States has no proprietary right in the waters of our rivers; that its control is that of sovereign over interstate commerce and over rivers as instrumentalities of interstate commerce. I am not sure but that the position assumed by the Senator from California is a correct one from a legal point of view. If that position is correct, it follows that all the National Government can do is not to permit structures in or upon a river which might be obstructions to interstate commerce, and to so regulate those structures whilst granting the permit as to promote and not obstruct interstate commerce.

But, Mr. President, I do not like the machinery which the Senator has chosen for the exercise of this power of the national sovereignty to grant a permit to construct what otherwise might be an obstruction to interstate commerce. I do not believe that so important a matter should be trusted to the judgment of any one man, and particularly to the judgment of an official who changes politically with every administration and who frequently changes within an administration. I should much prefer the composite judgment of three men rather than the judgment of one man: First, because I think three men would be likely to have more information on the subject than would one man, and, if they did not have it, that they would acquire it; and, second, because the clash of intellect involved in hearing the facts and in the decision upon the facts will be more likely to produce an intelligent judgment from three men than it will from one man. I should, therefore, like to see the amendment which the Senator suggests changed by adding to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I propose to invest this power in the Secretary of War because that jurisdiction has always been accorded to the War Department, and, of course, the subject will be investigated by the engineers of the War Department. The Secretary of War has a right to impose any conditions that are necessary to protect the Government. The department may require plans and specifications, bond, or anything else that is necessary in order to protect the Government. I am unable to see how the matter would be benefited in the least by adding two other heads of departments under the circumstances.

The Senator will notice that, so far as the disposition of the public lands is concerned, I have provided that that shall be taken care of by the department under which Government lands are disposed of, which I think is the appropriate thing to do; in other words, I vest in the Secretary of War the power to deal with the matter that is within his jurisdiction and in the Secretary of the Interior the power that belongs to him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I should prefer, Mr. President, to coordinate them in one body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada make a motion to amend the pending substitute?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish first to discuss the amendment.

It is true, as the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] observes, that thus far the Secretary of War has had the exclusive control over our navigable rivers, but I have for years contended that that jurisdiction should not be confined to the Secretary of War, but should be extended to other members of the Cabinet, who have jurisdiction over various parts of the water question, without the full consideration of which it is impossible to solve the water problem satisfactorily. The Interior Department has jurisdiction over the public lands, the public domain, so called, and the sources of many of these rivers are in the public domain. The Secretary of the Interior has under his control the whole question of irrigation. The withdrawal of waters from the source streams of navigable rivers for the purpose of reclaiming arid land is a matter that may relate——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator does not mean to say that the Secretary of the Interior has control of the irrigation of lands except under the reclamation law? He has no general jurisdiction or power over the irrigation of land.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; he has no general power over the irrigation of land. He has the power under the reclamation act.

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The withdrawal of these waters for the reclamation of arid lands may seriously affect navigation, either to its advantage or its disadvantage. If that withdrawal is so accomplished as to turn out from the stream the waters during the period of flood, and then to allow them to sweep back during the period of drought, thus maintaining a more equal flow of the stream, that, of course, is to the advantage of navigation; but if these flood waters are withdrawn and never return to the stream, and they are essential to the maintenance of the stream for purposes of navigation, their withdrawal may operate to the disadvantage of navigation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The amendment is intended to meet that situation. It provides in so many words that the Secretary may impose such conditions as will protect and preserve navigation. I presume he could guard against anything suggested by the Senator as endangering navigation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I should prefer, Mr. President, not to leave the matter to his sole judgment. I should prefer that the Secretary of the Interior should be included in all the hearings and inquiries relating to so important a subject matter and that he, as well as the Secretary of War, should participate in the determination. So also with the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture has jurisdiction over agriculture generally, and we have given him jurisdiction over a division called the Drainage Division of the Agricultural Department. The purpose of that division is to study all the problems that relate to the drainage of land and to the reclamation of swamp lands. That service has an intimate relation to the rivers. Just to the extent that you prevent the natural overflow of waters over the swamp lands, to that extent it is absolutely necessary that you provide flood reservoirs elsewhere, or else raise the levees upon the banks of the streams. Thus far the natural outlet of the great floods has been not only the gulfs and the oceans into which the rivers finally empty, but the very vast areas of so-called swamp lands adjoining the rivers over which the flood waters spread themselves and thus lose their violence, and just to the extent that they flood adjoining lands, to that extent the height and the violence of the flood below is diminished; so that the treatment of drainage becomes an important element in navigation.

If navigation depends, as I insist it does, upon making the river a perfected instrumentality of transportation, with a flow made as permanent and as equal and as sustained as possible during the entire period of the year—not a raging flood at one time and a diminished attenuated flow at another—and inasmuch as the reclamation of these swamp lands means the prevention of the spread of flood waters over them, to that extent you must deepen the channel of the stream itself in order to accommodate the increased flow, and to that extent the maintenance of these waters in the accustomed channel raises the height of the stream and increases the danger of that stream to adjoining cities and towns and cultivable areas.

So all these questions are interrelated and they have an intimate connection with navigation itself, for the treatment and the development of all these incidental purposes to which water is put have a direct effect upon the volume of the stream itself and its steadiness of flow, a steadiness which is essential, within certain limits, to the promotion of interstate transportation.

That is one of the difficulties I have with the pending bill, that it makes the Secretary of War the sole guardian of our navigable rivers—an official whose experiences do not reach out at all to these problems that relate to the reclamation of arid lands and to the reclamation of swamp lands, whose experience is a narrow one by reason of that fact; and who has not the information upon which he can act with wisdom regarding so important a matter as the regulation of stream flow.

I would add to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, also the Secretary of Commerce, for one reason, because he has jurisdiction over commerce. The promotion of interstate and foreign commerce is particularly within his domain. That department has been engaged for years in the study of many of the problems that relate to water, and particularly to the problems that relate to water transportation, both foreign and domestic. It has, as one of its divisions, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, a scientific division that is engaged in the study of water, not only of our coasts, but of the rivers themselves, and which has charge of the lighting of rivers and the warnings of shoals and sand bars, and so forth. It has had until recently a Bureau of Corporations, which, some years ago, made a most exhaustive study of the whole question of waterway transportation. It also has the Bureau of Fisheries, a very important division, relating to our rivers, for we all realize that scientific dealing with the question of the fisheries has much to do with the daily life of our people, so far as the food problem is concerned.

Mr. President, when we propose to authorize the executive department of the Government to grant a permit regarding the obstruction of our navigable rivers I can not understand why all the departments which have jurisdiction over any of the uses that relate to the waters, to their regulation and control, or the increase or diminution of their volume, should not be consulted. If we are to give this power to one man, I believe in giving it to the President of the United States only, who is in himself the executive department of the Government; but if we are going behind the President of the United States and seeking out for executive officials charged severally with the exercise of a part of his powers, I believe that we should organize into one commission, or a board, all the officials who divide responsibility relating to waters.

There is another matter upon which I wish to comment, and that is regarding the permit. The substitute of the Senator from California provides in section 2:

> That such permit shall not be issued to any such corporation until it shall first have acquired the right, under the laws of the State in which the dam is to be located, to construct such dam—

And so forth.

Does the Senator contemplate under this section that it will be necessary for the State to have developed by law some proper system of control over public utilities before this permit shall be granted? The Senator will understand that in some of the States it is quite possible that no such control has been exercised, and, therefore, the permit may go to a corporation which will be absolutely free of all control.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I do not know of any State which has not a public-utility commission or other organization which controls matters of this kind, except Utah, which, I think, has not provided any means of controlling the distribution of water; but Utah should have something of that kind, and probably would have under this bill if it became necessary. I think it would be one inducement to the State to do what I think all of them should do, namely, provide proper means for the control of rates for the use of water.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the Senator does not make the grant of this permit contingent upon the fact that a State has organized a system of control, as I understand.

Mr. WORKS. No.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, that is the only defect that I find in section 2, and I admit that that is not a very serious matter, because I dare say the fact is, as the Senator has stated, that almost all of the States have devised a system of control over public utilities.

Now, Mr. President, I move as an amendment that wherever the words "the Secretary of War" occur, immediately after those words there be added the words "the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture," and that the verb "is" be changed to "are."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to one or two features of this bill. I can not agree with the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], who seems to think that this measure is not in any way in the interest of navigation. I believe that it is very distinctly in the interest of navigation. It is my firm conviction that, if this bill is enacted into law, a great many dams will be constructed in the rivers of this country where there is now practically no navigation, and that many stretches of the rivers which can not be used at this time will become navigable. Let me refer the Senate to a case which came up in Congress about 10 or 12 years ago, and with which I was quite familiar. A permit was asked by the city of Chattanooga to construct a dam for power purposes at a place called Hales Bar on the Tennessee River about 30 miles below the city of Chattanooga. After very considerable trouble and delay, the matter being considered for at least two years, Congress finally passed a law authorizing the construction of that dam. It was thought that it would cost about $3,000,000; but when the attempt was made it was found that the foundation was very defective, and the cost ran something over $9,000,000. The dam was built by private persons, and the result of its construction was that navigation was extended not only up to the city of Chattanooga, a distance of 30 miles, but 8 or 10 miles beyond.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I think the Senator's statement is a very strong argument in favor of my amendment, because the amendment provides, without limitations or conditions, that the Secretary of War may grant permits to construct dams, as the Senator is so desirous of having them constructed, and therefore carries out precisely what he is seeking. The bill that is now pending throws all sorts of conditions around the construction of such dams. Those conditions my amendment eliminates. I am not opposed to the Senator's view that this bill may be beneficial to navigation, but I am trying to open the way so that navigation may be improved and water power developed.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, possibly, if we had reached the ideal in this life, or ever could reach it, the views of the Senator from California might be the wisest—I am not prepared to say that under such circumstances they would not be—but I do not think it practicable nor advisable to pass a measure of this kind unless it contains proper restrictions and safeguards, just as I understand this bill does.

Now, Mr. President, there are, if I am correctly informed, about 30 rivers in the United States on which power dams will very probably be constructed, and these dams will become links in the chain of improvements for the navigation and complete development of these rivers which the Government is very apt to undertake some day. I have mentioned just one of them, and I will call the attention of the Senate to several other rivers where we will probably have a very marked improvement as the result of this legislation. The Susquehanna River, possibly up to the city of Harrisburg, can be improved; the Roanoke, a distance of 110 miles, I believe, can be improved; probably 518 miles on the Cumberland will be improved by power dams; and some additional dams will doubtless be constructed by the United States Government to close the links in the chain. Navigation can also be improved by the construction of power dams on the Kentucky River for probably 90 miles, on the Santee for 30 miles, on the Wateree for 67 miles, on the Congaree for 51 miles, and on the Savannah for 106 miles. On the Tennessee River above Chattanooga for 188 miles there are several sites where power dams may be constructed. On the Coosa River in Alabama, from Montgomery, for 300 miles there are several very valuable sites. On the Connecticut River from Hartford at least up to Holyoke; on the Kanawha and New Rivers in West Virginia; possibly on the Des Moines; on the Wisconsin from its junction with the Mississippi; on the Osage in Missouri; on the St. Croix in Minnesota and Wisconsin; and on the White River in Arkansas and Missouri. I mention just a few of these rivers.

Mr. President, in my long experience on the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives and the Commerce Committee of the Senate I have come to the conclusion that there are a number of rivers in this country which ought to be improved, but the cost thereof would in some cases be so great that it will be many years before the improvement will be undertaken by Congress. In many instances links in the great chain of improvements, just as at Hales Bar, on the Tennessee River, will be undertaken for power purposes; and such a large percentage of the respective rivers will be improved for navigation as a result of this work undertaken for power development that the cost to finish the remainder would be very small. So I am convinced, sir, that under this bill there will be a tremendous impetus given to the improvement of the rivers of this country for the purpose of navigation.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] made a very interesting address several days ago in support of his amendment proposing to appropriate $60,000,000 a year for the next 10 years for certain purposes described therein, and to give immediately $10,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River below Cairo. I do not think the Senator intends seriously to press that amendment to a vote on the pending bill, but he desired merely to bring it before Congress. I shall not attempt to discuss the provisions of his amendment in detail, but I wish to call the attention of Congress to one very important feature thereof, which is illustrated by the floods now passing down the Mississippi River.

I have been a victim of overflows from that river, a personal sufferer from the floods, and I claim to speak from personal information. A few days ago I asked the Weather Bureau to prepare for me some maps showing on what portions of the country the rains which caused the present flood fell and how much water was precipitated, so that, with the maps before us, we might determine for ourselves what means of relief could be adopted for the control of these floods.

Now, if the Senate feels interested enough to follow me for a moment, I should like to call its attention to this map [indicating], a map of the United States. I ask Senators to notice this dotted line here [indicating], which is drawn to show the watershed of the Mississippi River. You will see that it extends into the State of New York on the east, coming southward through Pennsylvania and a portion of old Virginia, taking in all of West Virginia, some of North Carolina, a portion of Georgia, a portion of Alabama, the greater part of Mississippi, and then descends to the Gulf. Going from New York you will notice here that it follows along the rim of Lake Erie; then, a little south of Lake Michigan, follows up along the west shore of Lake Michigan to within a short distance of Duluth, at the extreme western end of Lake Superior; then, in its long journey westward, it goes into the Dominion of Canada; then turns south again between Idaho and Montana, down through Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas to the Gulf. A very large portion of the United States is within the drainage area of the Mississippi.

But what I wish particularly to invite the attention of the Senate to is the portion of the map which is colored. As I have just stated, we have a big flood now passing down the Mississippi River. From the mouth of the Arkansas River to a point below Vicksburg it is the greatest flood on record. Never before has the water attained such a great height as this year. Now, where did the rains fall which caused this great flood?

If you will look on this map, you will notice in the red area that there was a big fall of rain, from 1 to 2 inches, in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Missouri, a small part of Kansas, a portion of eastern Oklahoma, and a very small part of Texas. The blue area, which indicates a rainfall of from 2 to 4 inches, shows that the water fell in Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, a small portion of Missouri, and in the eastern part of Oklahoma and Kansas. Then there is a very small area marked in yellow where the rainfall was over 4 inches; this area was exclusively in Oklahoma. These rains fell for the two days January 21 and 22 of this year. There was a little lull in the rain after that; this second map [indicating] shows the rainfall from January 26 to January 31, 1916, a period of six days. Notice on the map where these rains fell—in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky. The red area show a precipitation of from 1 to 2 inches; the blue indicates a rainfall of from 2 to 4 inches, and it is, as you will notice, in the interior of those same States. The yellow indicates a rainfall of from 4 to 6 inches, still in the interior of those States, the blue being the outer border. That yellow part, where the very heavy rain fell, was in Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, and a small part of Tennessee and Kentucky. The brown area indicates a rainfall of over 6 inches, which was in Arkansas.

Senators, you have heard a great deal on this floor, and doubtless many of you have read much, about the means of controlling the floods of the mighty Father of Waters. You have heard about reservoirs at the sources of these streams, and all sorts of schemes have been suggested. But I wish to ask any Senator within the hearing of my voice to look on these maps and then to rise in his place and tell me if he knows a single available reservoir site where these recent flood-producing rains fell. These rains, Senators, fell in the very richest portion of the United States, the highly developed parts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Kentucky. Where could reservoirs be located in any of these States in the construction of which it would not be necessary to use land a great deal more valuable than the lands along the lower Mississippi which are sought to be protected?

The only way in which you can construct a reservoir is to build a dam, levee, or work of some kind entirely around the place where the water is to be impounded. It is usually done by constructing a big levee from one hill to another hill and holding the water within the valley. There are practically no valleys in this area; these are level regions. It is true that in Tennessee and Kentucky there are some small valleys, but no available sites for reservoirs. The land in those valleys is very rich and thickly dotted with many villages, towns, and cities. It would cost an enormous sum to construct a reservoir big enough to do any good.

Senators, the overflowed area of the Mississippi River is 29,000 square miles, which is larger than a great many of the States of the Union. It is as large as the combined area of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Delaware, New Jersey, and Rhode Island and comprises some of the richest sections of the country, and when the water breaks the bounds of the levees it flows over this enormous area. If you are going to hold back the water, you must have an area relatively as large as the area you propose to protect. Your ordinary common sense will tell you that. Now, where will you find that area?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted.

Mr. REED. The Senator has told us the number of States draining into the Mississippi—a very large number. The territory indicated on his map embraces a considerable portion of the United States. Has the Senator computed, or had computed, the amount of rainfall within that district and the size of a reservoir that it would take to hold it?

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator mean the rainfall that is causing the present flood, now passing down the Mississippi?

Mr. REED. No; the floods—the severe floods which we have. I mean to get at this: The proposition has been put before us on a number of occasions that we ought to build a series of reservoirs sufficiently large so that the surplus waters could be impounded and gradually released, utilizing them for irrigation or other purposes, but always to have a reservoir large enough to hold these surplus waters, to the end that they might not flow down and create these great floods. Now, of course, that involves the building of a reservoir big enough to hold the surplus waters. Has the Senator had the size of that reservoir calculated?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; I have not; and I do not believe it would be very easy to calculate that. One of the calculations made in regard to the flood of 1913 was to the effect that Lake Erie—which is, I believe, about 10,000 square miles in area—would be filled by one day's flow of the Mississippi, if I mistake not, to a depth of several feet. Assuming that all the water were taken out of Lake Erie, one day's downpour of the water through the valley would, as I recall the figures, fill that lake to a depth of several feet, and, as the floods usually last for four or five weeks, it is evident that Lake Erie, with its 10,000 square miles of area, would have been filled over and over again. It would not have been, to use a slang expression, "a drop in the bucket" as a reservoir to hold back the awful volumes of water which pour down the Mississippi in time of great floods.

Now let me call your attention to another big flood, that of 1913. I am glad that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is present, because that flood did enormous damage in Ohio and Indiana, destroying millions of dollars' worth of property and sacrificing many human lives.

You will notice on this third map [pointing] that the red portion, which indicates a rainfall of from 2 to 4 inches, extends over quite a large area. It even gets up into the Dominion of Canada, crosses Lake Erie at this point, and goes into New York. Of course a portion of that water did not go down the Mississippi; certainly not that part which was on the northern side of the Lakes; but, with the exception of this little area which I am indicating with the pointer—the northeastern end of it, so to speak—all the remainder of that great rainfall had to pass down the Mississippi.

You will notice here that this is the precipitation for the five days from March 23 to March 27, 1913, the time when Indiana and Ohio suffered so heavily from floods. The red portion indicates a fall of from 2 to 4 inches, the yellow a fall of from 4 to 6 inches, the green a fall of from 6 to 8 inches, the brown a fall of from 8 to 10 inches, and the blue a fall of over 10 inches. This blue part is right in the heart of the State of Ohio. The brown part is in Ohio and Indiana. The flood not only did enormous local damage to the people of these States, but it played havoc on the lower Mississippi, destroying property and lives in its terrible sweep to the Gulf of Mexico.

Senators, my only purpose in calling your attention to these facts is to ask you and to ask the distinguished Senator from Ohio whether there are any available reservoir sites known which could have held back any appreciable part of this flood? Note that the greater portion of the water was in Indiana and Ohio and that the rains were very extended. They lasted for five days and covered a vast area, and even if you could have had some reservoirs to hold back a part of the water in those States you could not have impounded enough to have saved us on the lower river.

My understanding is that the people of those communities in Ohio and Indiana, brave and independent, have not waited for Congress to help them, but have gone on in a most energetic manner studying the problems presented there as carefully as engineering skill could and trying to devise some means to prevent a repetition of the awful disaster. So far, if I am correctly informed, about the only practical thing that has been suggested is to remove some of the bridges in the river which amounted almost to dams and to clear the obstructions which, in front of some of the towns, have been built out into the streams; in other words, to restore the streams just as nearly as possible to the condition in which nature had placed them. I believe that is all that has been worked out up to date.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator is in part mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Ohio enlighten me.

Mr. POMERENE. It is true that the plans contemplated that to some extent; but we have what we call our conservation law, and under the provisions of that law dams can be constructed across a stream so as to keep the water back, and there has been a great deal of thought given to the subject. The constitutionality of the law was attacked, but it has been sustained by our courts, and I think these improvements will gradually go on. Of course they are so extensive that they can not be made in a year nor in two years, but there will be much done along that line, I think.

Mr. RANSDELL. Before the Senator takes his seat will he kindly tell us whether or not the study of flood conditions in Ohio indicates that any very large quantity of that water might be impounded in reservoirs; and if so, where could the reservoirs be built?

Mr. POMERENE. I can not speak with exactness on that subject. There are plans under consideration for the Miami River Valley above Dayton and Hamilton, two sections of the State that were most severely injured by the great floods.

Mr. RANSDELL. Those plans would probably impound some portion of the water?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. RANSDELL. Can the Senator tell us the character of the land and improvements in those valleys?

Mr. POMERENE. In the western part of the State the land is practically level, and particularly is this true in the northwesterly portion. Probably 50 years ago much of that was swamp land; but now it has been drained out, and it is the garden spot of the world.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is very highly developed land, is it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. RANSDELL. And of very great value?

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. RANSDELL. What would the Senator say that land is probably worth per acre?

Mr. POMERENE. From $150 to $200 or $250 an acre, most of it.

Mr. RANSDELL. How does the Senator think the value of that land would compare with the undeveloped lands on the lower Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. I have no knowledge at all of the values below.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator would not suppose that those undeveloped woodlands would begin to compare in value, however, with the highly improved portion of the Senator's own State, would he?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I should think not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an observation right here?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be very glad, indeed, to have the Senator do so.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has alluded to the fact that in Ohio the energies of the people have been mainly directed, thus far, to clearing the streams themselves of obstructions in the shape of ridges, and so forth.

Mr. RANSDELL. That was my information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. Now, I will ask the Senator whether the clearing of those streams of obstructions in that way, and thus permitting that entire area to shed its water quickly to the Ohio and thence to the Mississippi River below, will not have the effect of increasing the height of the flood in the rivers below?

Mr. RANSDELL. Beyond question. That has been the result of all the splendid system of drainage which has been carried on for many years in States like Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and some Northwestern States. Some years ago, I am told, there were a great many natural reservoirs in those States in the shape of shallow lakes scattered around everywhere. The Senator from Ohio has just told us that in northwestern portion of his State there were swamp lands. Undoubtedly in the spring the rain fell on those swamp lands and the water got pretty high. A considerable quantity of it was held there in the natural reservoirs; but when these lands were drained, and splendid canal ditches and tiled drains of every kind put in, which carried the water into the various rivers, it immediately rushed down with much greater velocity and force than ever before into the Ohio, increasing the problem for every one living along the Ohio as well as on the lower Mississippi.

Mr. President, it may be said, and said truly, that those improvements which benefit the people in these Western and Northern States, namely, the best possible drainage of their lands, has added tremendously to the problems on the lower Mississippi. The water gets to the lower river with much greater rapidity than ever before. I remember some years ago hearing Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, then president of the Illinois Central Railroad, in testifying before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives, make this statement: "When I was a young man," he said, "I traveled extensively, especially in Illinois and Indiana, and there were a great many shallow lakes at that time. When the rains fell those lakes all filled up, and in the aggregate they held a very large quantity of water." He mentioned the East St. Louis Flats, just across from the city of St. Louis. "Now," said he, "you can travel for hundreds of miles over Illinois, Indiana, and other States and where the shallow lakes once existed you now see the most magnificent farms. You see canal ditches, tiled drains, improvements of every kind and sort; and the East St. Louis Flats, once a marsh, is now land worth $250 an acre, producing the most magnificent crops." And that splendid improvement, which has added so much to the wealth of the United States, has, again let me say, added to the problem on the lower river, because the water gets there now with much greater velocity and in much greater volume. In these shallow reservoirs a great deal of it was evaporated by the sun and winds. Now there is no chance for evaporation. It goes with a rush down to the lower river. The process by which the country above is relieved, is the process by which the country below is destroyed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon my making an observation just at this point, the process of drainage which has been commenced up there is practically in its infancy. Last year I had the pleasure of traveling through a good deal of the State of Iowa, and a gentleman showed me a magnificent body of land, embracing something like three or four thousand acres, which a few years before that was a lake from 2 to 6 feet deep of water during the dry season in the summer. When he showed it to me it had growing on it the most magnificent crop of corn that I have ever seen; and he told me that the owners bought it for $2.50 an acre when covered with water, and that it could not be purchased at that time for $250 an acre.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for this very enlightening and helpful observation. I am sure that what he says about that particular case is true in perhaps hundreds or thousands of others throughout this vast drainage area, which constitutes more than 40 per cent of the whole area of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. RANSDELL. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator from Louisiana that the rapid drainage of these States in the upper Mississippi Valley has had the effect of increasing the flow in the lower Mississippi and increasing the violence of these floods. I presume he agrees with me, however, that the reclamation of the lands in the lower Mississippi, constituting the Mississippi Delta, by the construction of levees, has also the effect of preventing those flood waters from spreading out over the areas that they have been accustomed to spread over, thus concentrating the flow in the stream itself, thus raising its height and imperiling the towns and cities along its banks, as well as the levees that have been raised for the protection of the reclaimed areas.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, that is entirely correct. May I elaborate for just a moment on what the Senator is saying now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. In corroboration of what the Senator says, not so very many years ago there was a big area in the valley known as the St. Francis Basin, a portion of it being in Missouri and a portion in Arkansas. In round numbers it aggregated 7,000 square miles. The levee system did not begin in that section until about 25 years ago, as I recall, and whenever the Mississippi River rose out of its normal banks the water would flow into that vast area, fill it up, and get very deep in places. This basin of 7,000 square miles held a colossal volume of water. About 18 years ago the levees were practically completed, though not up to the splendid grade that they are at present, but still pretty good levees. When the floods came they could not flow out over that area, being held within the banks of the river by the levees. Thus the river rose higher and higher, and every now and then a break would occur. The same kind of development has been continued along the lower river, toward the mouth, for instance, of the White River and the Arkansas River, toward the mouth of the Yazoo, in the State of Mississippi, and down toward the mouth of the Red River, in my own State. The area which was formerly a reservoir, a great holding basin for the floods of the river, is now very much restricted, and those waters are compelled to stay within the banks of the river—or, rather, within the artificial boundaries formed by the levees.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand, in most cases the levees are quite far back from the banks.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They serve in that way to enlarge the superficial area of the river in periods of flood.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true of the upper river but not of the lower. On the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Red River to the Gulf of Mexico the levees are very close to the banks of the river; and there is practically no caving on the river in that section. But on the upper river, all through the northeastern portion of Louisiana, the northwestern portion of Mississippi, the eastern portion of Arkansas, and the southeastern portion of Missouri, in many cases the levees are a considerable distance back from the bank. It is not customary to build a levee nearer than 300 or 400 yards, normally, and in many instances they are put as much as half a mile back. That is done for two purposes—to widen the channel and give a greater space to hold the waters, and to prevent those levees from caving into the river; because the Mississippi is a great, winding, tortuous stream flowing down through a loamy, sandy soil, and in those big bends it comes with such a terrible rush that it cuts the soil away, caves away vast quantities of it, and in many instances caves a levee into the river, and a new levee has to be built back of it. In order to avoid that, we build the levees a long distance back.

Perhaps I may be permitted to narrate a very simple story in connection with that. I went to Lake Providence in 1882 and lived with my sister, Mrs. Montgomery, whose home then was close to the river bank. One could stand on the front gallery and throw a rock into the river. Since 1882 I have seen that home moved back twice because of the caving banks. It now sets fully a half mile back of where it was when I went to Lake Providence in 1882. The story is that the home was built about 1844 by Mr. William Gleason, and it was so far back from the river, fully a mile and a quarter, that his neighbors came to him and laughingly said, "Mr. Gleason, what do you mean by building your home so far back; you can not see the boats that pass up and down the river." Said he, "That is all right. I can see their smoke; and I want to live in this house while I live. I do not want to see it cave into the river, but my children will see it cave into the river." That was about 1844. When I went to Lake Providence in 1882, the river had moved until, as I said, you could stand on the front gallery and throw a rock into it. Since then I have seen it cave back fully half a mile.

Now, those are some of the problems which require us to build levees back from the river. But, thank heaven, we are beginning to solve that problem, and solve it wisely, by revetting the banks of the river, so that when we construct levees now they are permanent. It costs a good deal of money, but it can be done, and it is being done rapidly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator that the economy in the revetment of the banks is not only a saving of the banks of the river but in the prevention of the caving of the levees and an enormous saving in land.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is absolutely true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. For that reason there ought not to be any sort of objection to the Government taking this great problem in hand. It would be a wise economy if it should do it now and do it adequately.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think the Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator that both bank revetment and levee building are essential on the lower Mississippi, but I wish to question him particularly with reference to the drainage that is constantly going on, and which it is demonstrated has occurred in Indiana, Ohio, and other States in the upper Mississippi Valley, and that is also going on in the delta of the lower Mississippi, thus transferring the flow into the channel of the river itself, overflowing that channel and causing the destruction of towns and large areas. I wish to question the Senator as to the value of the land in Ohio reclaimed, or the value of the land that has been reclaimed in the St. Francis Basin, to which he refers. What is the present value of that land?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not give you accurate figures on that, but I can tell you something about the value down in Louisiana where it has been reclaimed. It is not over from $25 to $50 per acre for the best improved lands and not over $8 to $10 per acre for the unimproved lands. The lands are nothing like as valuable as those in Ohio and other States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I imagine if there would be a proper and complete system of reclamation the value of this land would be very much greater, would it not?

Mr. RANSDELL. It would enhance enormously. In the upper portion of the Yazoo Delta in Mississippi there has not been a break in the levees for many years. The lands are more than twice as valuable there as they are in Arkansas and Louisiana, where occasional breaks occur, though the soil is of the same character.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suppose the Senator's view is that they have not approached as yet the full development of the lands in the Mississippi Delta as compared with the development of lands in Ohio and Indiana and in other States where they have been reclaimed?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is entirely true. Only a small percentage of those lands there have been put under cultivation. A very large percentage is still in virgin forest. It is all as fertile land as exists anywhere on earth. The famous Judge Robert Taylor spoke of it as the geological cream of the American Continent. He said that the Mississippi Valley was made up of the richest washings of the hillsides and valleys of 31 States of the Union.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana if an estimate ever has been made by any authorities at his suggestion as to the amount of land that would be required to impound the waters that fall within the area marked on the map so as to hold it back and save the lower Mississippi from inundation?

Mr. RANSDELL. No accurate estimate has ever been made. Some one said that if you will take the whole State of Illinois and make a reservoir of it, it would perhaps hold water enough. Others question that. I have already mentioned the estimate made in regard to Lake Erie.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Am I correctly informed that Col. Townsend, president of the Mississippi River Commission, made an estimate in which he stated that it would cost seventy-odd million dollars to build a reservoir sufficiently large to hold the water that passes the city of Memphis down the Mississippi River at high tide within 24 hours?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have understood that Col. Townsend made that statement. I am not sure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is about half of the total cost of completing the whole project of leveeing and revetting the banks of the river, is it not?

Mr. RANSDELL. About that. It would cost, according to the estimate of the Mississippi River Commission, in round numbers, $60,000,000, to make the levees so strong that they will hold a flood as great as any which has ever passed down the river. We have records of floods since 1844, and if we put $60,000,000 in the levees we will be safe against any flood that has reached that valley since 1844.

In further answer to the Senator's question, it will cost a very considerable sum to revet the banks of the river so as to prevent the levees from caving in. It would probably cost $80,000,000 to $100,000,000, but the appropriations would cover a long period of years. You can not do the work rapidly. You can not advantageously expend more than three or four million dollars a year on the work of bank revetment. One reason is that the weak places in the banks of the river do not develop very rapidly, but only appear from time to time.

Another trouble is that the revetment is made by small pliable willows, and there is only a limited growth of them on the river. Three or four million dollars a year through a period of 25 or 30 years will probably be necessary to completely finish the revetment of the banks, but not exceeding $60,000,000 need be expended altogether, in the next six or seven years, for the purpose of building proper levees to hold back all the awful flood waters which come from 31 States of the Union, and which come on all the more quickly because of the splendid system of drainage developed in many of those States, as I have attempted to show.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that I agree with all he has said with reference to the necessity of bank revetments and levee building on the lower reaches of the Mississippi below Cairo, but I must say I take exception to the line of reasoning in which the Senator seems to be indulging, that the lands are so valuable in the upper Mississippi Valley that it will be impossible to secure, without vast expenditures of money, proper reservoir sites, and that therefore the scientific study of this question and the scientific development of river regulation should be applied mainly to the lower reaches of the river.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will just complete my sentence, and then I should like to hear from him.

The Senator seems to assume that those who favor a full development of the river with all its tributaries and source streams and a full regulation and control of river flow hold that it can only be accomplished by the construction of reservoirs in the mountains and valleys of the upper Mississippi. I wish to say that that is only one form of obstructing the flow of the waters to their ultimate destination in the Gulf of Mexico; and that among other devices is the increase of the forest areas which are the natural reservoirs of moisture which hold it; that is, the scientific soil cultivation in such a way as to absorb instead of shedding moisture, and in addition to that the seeping of these waters and taking them out upon the arid lands, whence they will sink back gradually to the stream, and not in the period of flood when you only add to your difficulty below; but in a period of drought they will serve simply to make a safe flow of the stream for navigation.

What I insist upon, and I am going to be a little personal in this matter, is that the men of the South have had their eyes only upon that kind of development which relates to their immediate neighborhood and that they have not acknowledged the necessity of so addressing curselves to the question of the flow of waters from the sheds on which they fall as to gradually obstruct the flow and thus prevent their addition to the flow of the river below during the period of floods. To the extent that we slow the progress of the waters above by putting them to some useful purpose, to that extent we greatly serve the region which the Senator represents by diminishing the crest of the flood. The danger comes from the extra 1, 2, or 3 feet of water, which if checked in its flow would vastly serve large areas above and at the same time, by the check, save the country below from devastation.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. All these illustrations about the size of the reservoirs that will be necessary to hold great floods of the Mississippi River are entirely out of place, because—recollect we are dealing now with the Mississippi River, which at New Orleans is, I believe, about 150 feet deep, and it is only the upper 2 or 3 or 4 feet of that great depth that threaten destruction and devastation to that region. If you can only prevent that extra number of feet from accumulating by obstructing the flow above and putting that water to useful purposes, you serve a great, useful purpose below.

I wish to complain of the entire southern region that has been absolutely without any conception of the necessary work that should be applied to the water control above, and have their eyes only to their limited areas, and have insisted on bank revetments and levee building.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask leave to go ahead with my speech. I wish to answer the Senator as well as I can. I do not think that the people of the South have that very limited vision which the Senator seems to attribute to us. Certainly the people of that section, and the honored Presiding Officer of the Senate [Mr. CLARKE or Arkansas in the chair] as one of them, would be delighted to have any means of relief that any human being could give them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield in just one moment, if you please.

Mr. President, more than a third of a century ago, in 1879, a great commission was created by Congress to study the flood problems of the Mississippi River. That commission was composed of three engineer officers of the Army, generally with the rank of colonel, two engineers from civil life, one of them being the great James B. Eads, one engineer from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and one civilian—seven in all. The first civilian was Benjamin Harrison, afterwards President of the United States. The next civilian was Robert S. Taylor, of Fort Wayne, Ind., who lives two or three hundred miles from the Mississippi and is one of the greatest men in America to-day, in my judgment. He was for 33 consecutive years a member of that commission, and resigned voluntarily at the end of that time. He was succeeded by Mr. Edward A. Glenn, of the State of Missouri.

Sir, that has been as fine a body of engineering experts as it was possible to secure. They have studied the flood problem of the Mississippi from every point of view. They have sent their men to the Old World to study floods on the Po, the Nile, the Danube, the Volga, and on every river of the Old World where there are floods. They have done everything which human intelligence, backed by plenty of money, could do to find out the best means of controlling the Mississippi River floods. As a result of more than a third of a century of continuous study, that great commission, with entire unanimity of opinion, without a single dissenting voice, say there is one way, and one alone, to control floods on the Mississippi River, and that is by building the levees so strong, so high, with such a wide base, such a wide crown, that the waters which come will not break them. It is a simple business problem of so much dirt. If those levees are made that strong they will hold the water back.

Now, Mr. President, the people down there would be delighted to have other means of relief. The people down there are not a narrow, contracted set of people. I remember well a few years ago when the people of the arid West were asking Congress to come to their relief. It was my pleasure at that time to join with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and others in passing that original legislation. I was one southerner to make a speech in favor of it, taking the ground that I was begging Congress to keep the water off my lands, and it was just as much the duty of Congress to put water on land where there was none as it was to keep it off land where there was too much.

We would be delighted, sir, to have reservoirs built wherever they can be constructed; to have them built for irrigation, if that can be done. We would be delighted, sir, to increase the porosity and absorbent qualities of the soil which the Senator from Nevada so eloquently speaks about, if that can be done. Here and now I pledge myself as one southern Senator, as one who lives on the Mississippi River, to join, by my voice and my vote, in any measure of relief which looks to the reasonable protection of our friends in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, in Indiana, in Kansas, in any portion of the country from the awful floods which devastate them, whether my section is going to be benefited by it or not. If Federal problems are presented—and I believe they will be—they can get my assistance.

But here is what I do insist upon, Senators, and I believe you will admit I am reasonable: Until the problems of these various localities have been worked out in the same way that the problem of the lower Mississippi has been worked out, then do not hold back the appropriations for the lower Mississippi, waiting for the others. Let us appropriate the necessary money to finish these levees, and let us create the commission which the Senator from Nevada wants to have created. I will join with him now in asking that we create a commission to study all the waterways problem and see if we can not get some greater, some better measure of relief even than the levees are going to be.

But as this great engineering commission working for more than a third of a century has found the only means of relief for the lower Mississippi, in God's name, I say, give us that relief, and give it to us now. Do not keep us waiting forever for it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say I am in hearty sympathy with what the Senator has said with reference to the progress of the work on the lower Mississippi. Whilst I have been intent upon a full and comprehensive treatment of this whole subject I have never sought in any way to accomplish it by obstructing any works in the lower Mississippi. On the contrary, I have voted for every increase in appropriations for that purpose. I think it would be a great mistake to halt in any way the development of the levee and revetment work that is now going on there until this other problem can be met and solved.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for that, Mr. President, from the bottom of my soul.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say further that I recognize fully the Senator's breadth of view when he favored the reclamation act, and I know he acted with full national spirit then. There was nothing personal in my criticism, and I would be sorry really to indulge in any criticism with reference to my southern friends. But I have had the view that the danger there was so pressing and the consequences of neglect so dreadful that they naturally had their eyes opened and their energies absorbed by the difficulties in their immediate neighborhood, and that those very conditions prevented them possibly from accepting with hospitality views that were entertained by men who had not only had experience down there but in other parts of the country, and whose minds were directed toward the full control of the waters from the time they fall from the heavens in such a way as to slow their progress to the ocean and Gulf, and in the meanwhile putting them to every beneficial use in the creation of wealth as well as preventing the destructive application of these waters.

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am glad to know now that the Senator is disposed to enter with enthusiasm into this new field. The work I am sure will be productive of results.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am very sure of that. Now, just a word or two more in answer to the Senator. Even if the people of that valley, yourself, Mr. President, and myself and all the balance there are biased, and we naturally would be biased by the interest of ourselves and our people, how could men like Col. C. McD. Townsend, the president of the Mississippi River Commission, be biased? He is a citizen of New York, and other members of that commission are Col. Lansing H. Beach, born somewhere in New England; and another is Col. James G. Warren, born and reared in Detroit. Judge Robert S. Taylor, of Fort Wayne, Ind., was a member for 33 years. Another member is Maj. John A. Ockerson, who lives in St. Louis. It is not the southern people who have had the working out of these problems.

It is this splendid commission of great men from other sections of the country, entirely divested of local interest.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Only one was from the remote South.

Mr. RANSDELL. Only one was from the remote South. The balance were all from the North, East, and West.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will permit me just at this point——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be delighted to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is much merit in the great comprehensive plan proposed by the learned Senator from Nevada. He is one of those far-seeing dreamers who stand within the shadow of night and look beyond it toward the coming light and see far off with trance-prophetic eyes the consummation of the centuries.

I should like very much to see this great plan of his consummated; but it occurs to me, Mr. President, that it would require some modern Pharaoh, with the American people as his slaves, to consummate that undertaking within the next generation or two, and were the South to wait until we put it into operation those magnificent lands in the lower Mississippi Valley will be laid waste by the devastating floods, and the people will be driven out of the most fertile section of God's footstool.

Now, let us go ahead and perfect the system now in course of construction, and I am sure the extra cost will be so very slight that it ought not in the least to impede or retard the great work which the Senator from Nevada has in mind. I am hopeful that the campaign of education which the able Senator from Nevada is now conducting will bring forth an abundant harvest in the years to come.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Mississippi is quite correct in that. I think all the southern Senators, and I hope all those of the Union, are going to assist the Senator from Nevada in creating a machine which will work out, if possible, plans which the Congress may some day adopt to carry out these other things, but in the meantime, again let me say, do not ask us on the lower river to wait any longer. Give us what we need now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to reiterate that I believe in giving the money that is necessary to press this work in the lower Mississippi vigorously, and my vote will be with him. But the Senator has alluded to the fact that a great engineering commission composed of Engineers of the United States Army have been engaged in this work for years, and that the only method which they have pointed out of controlling the flow of the Mississippi River has been to take hold of it below Cairo, at the point of greatest flood, and construct reservoirs—practically one reservoir from Cairo down to the Gulf—by using the banks of the river on one side and levees upon the other, so that these reservoirs into which the water from above empty will empty gradually through the Passes of the Mississippi River.

I wish to say with reference to the Engineers of the United States Army that I have the greatest respect for that organization, for its capacity, its intelligence, and, above all, for its integrity; but I believe, and those who believe in this great work also believe, that the Engineers of the Army are not brought into contact with the great engineering problems of the day to the extent that engineers in civil life have been. I also believe——

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not object to a question, Mr. President, but I really think I ought to be allowed to finish my remarks.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me just to add one word more, I will quit.

I also believe that Congress itself has put the Engineer Corps of the Army in a strait-jacket. I can show numerous instances in the legislation of Congress where they have absolutely forbidden the Engineer Corps of the Army to suggest an idea, to take the initiative. So jealous has Congress been of its powers that it has always claimed the initiative in the Members of Congress of every project and has absolutely prevented by law the Engineers of the Army from the consideration of anything beyond it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield further to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, Mr. President, I am not an apologist for the Corps of Engineers of the Army. I do not know that they need any defense at my hands. I think it is one of the most remarkable services we have in the Government. There is not another that has a better record——

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I contend is——

Mr. RANSDELL. I decline to yield further.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Just let me say a word.

Mr. RANSDELL. I decline to yield. I have yielded to the Senator, and I decline to yield further.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Congress has placed the engineers in chains.

Mr. RANSDELL. No matter what the Senator says about the Engineer Corps of the Army, that can not be applied to the Mississippi River Commission. The Engineer Corps of the Army has never controlled the Mississippi River Commission. The Mississippi River Commission is composed of seven men, only three of whom are engineers, and it is a matter of comment and talk down in the Mississippi Valley that when there has been a difference of opinion four generally outvoted three. There were three engineers and four civilians. There have occasionally been differences of opinion among them, and the four civilians generally voted together, although, I may say, there has been splendid harmony in that great commission; they have worked together.

Mr. President, I do not think I could add any more to the subject, and I sincerely thank the Senate for the patience and attention which they have given me; but let me ask those of you who believe that any means could be adopted, except the levees, for the control of the present flood and the flood in 1913, to come and look at these maps which are on the wall of the Chamber. I shall leave them there until to-morrow night, and I ask you to come and look at them and see if you can find where any reservoir could have been constructed that would have held back these floods. I thank the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to add a single word to my remarks regarding the Engineer Corps of the Army. I meant no reflection whatever upon that corps, but I hold Congress itself responsible for putting the Engineer Corps of the Army in chains by its instructions. Congress itself has been devoted for over a hundred years to what has been termed the "spoils system"—the system of initiative regarding these great engineering works not by a competent and well-trained Engineer Corps, but initiative in Members of Congress—political, not engineering initiative. The result has been that the whole system has been scandalized and is now in such disrepute that it is falling to pieces.

The idea of taking hold of the great Mississippi River, with its tributaries and source streams in a detached way, obedient to the demands of a representative of the State of Missouri or of Mississippi and digging a channel here, or removing shoals and sand bars, and then taking hold of another section of the river a thousand miles away and dealing with that, when the avowed purpose, of course, of any intelligent body of men must be to make the entire river a perfect instrument of commerce, just as perfect as a railroad itself, with continuous rails, with side tracks, with stations, with all kinds of transfer facilities and conveniences, whereas the eyes of the Engineer Corps of the Army have been directed by Congress simply to detached portions of these great rivers, and works have progressed upon its detached portions without relation to each other. Think of improving the channel of the Mississippi River without providing transfer facilities! Think of providing for a river as an instrumentality of commerce without also providing for coordination with rails!

One reason for that possibly has been that the railroads themselves have dominated the policy of the country in these matters, Congress doubtless being ignorant of their purpose. There was often a demand for economy created. I remember one that was created with reference to the Missouri River, which led to the abandonment of revetment work and levee work that was being prosecuted below. I warrant that if you ask for the true source of the policy of economy then inaugurated, you will find that it was in the railroads themselves which were running along the banks of that river, and which feared that a competitive rival would be created by that great engineering work. So we have never been able to pursue a consecutive and continuous policy, having in view the completion of a river, artificializing it so as to make it a perfect instrumentality of commerce.

To-day we are told by the enemies of river regulation and development that interstate transportation by river is an utter failure. Having conducted the development of these rivers in such a way as to make it impossible to have any continuous navigation upon them, we are pointed to the large sums of money that we have uselessly spent upon them in inefficient work, and then are told, "See the large amount expended; not a steamer or a boat is upon the river. River transportation is an utter and entire failure." The reason of the failure is that the work has not been scientifically conducted with a fixed, determined plan to make these rivers as perfect as possible in all their conveniences and arrangements for the transportation of products.

Have we, then, to make the demonstration over again that rivers can be used for transportation? Can we not point to the Rhine, where they have the most perfect system of river transportation, dovetailing with rail and ocean transportation? Can we not point to the Danube and the Volga? And yet, to a large proportion of the American people to-day we have to demonstrate that river transportation is a possibility. We have to demonstrate that the reason the rivers are not being used is because they have never been scientifically developed or regulated.

I remember we had to go through the same thing with the irrigation propaganda. When we began that propaganda I believe that nine-tenths of the American people did not know that irrigation has been practiced from the earliest dawn of civilization. We had to demonstrate to them that it was practicable to take the flood waters out of the rivers and spread them over the deserts and to make those deserts productive. That propaganda had to be conducted for years before the intelligence of the American people was instructed; and I am afraid that we are going to have to go through the same process now to demonstrate to the American people that rivers can be used, although they have been used throughout all history, and are being used most effectively in Europe and on other continents to-day.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the fact that there are at least two places in this country where surplus water has been developed and structures erected on navigable streams by the Government, which might be used for the purposes of developing power, and that, as the law is now, the Government has no authority to dispose of that water in any way. As that situation is covered at least in part by the pending bill, I ask leave now to amend the amendment which I have presented by adding an additional section, to be numbered 4, including section 10 in the pending bill from the beginning down to the word "region," in line 5, on page 16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That privilege will be accorded to the Senator without objection.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not propose to debate the substitute offered to the pending bill by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. I did not debate the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING]. I regret that I was able to hear but little of the discussion of the amendment upon yesterday, as circumstances compelled me to be out of the Chamber most of the time. I had hoped to see the Senator's speech in the RECORD this morning, but, of course, it was not convenient for him to have it appear.

Mr. President, this bill has been before the Senate for about five weeks. Every possible feature of it, I think, has been discussed and considered. The arguments advanced in support of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and the amendment which is now pending of the Senator from California have been presented at various times during the discussion within the last five weeks, and I have answered them all. I do not intend to impose upon Senators by repeating those answers.

I wish to say merely, as to the substitute of the Senator from California, that everything in it is provided for in the bill which is now pending. For the committee, I hope that the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, first, upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "is" and to insert the words "the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture are," so that if so amended it will read:

That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture are hereby authorized to allow any municipal or private utility corporation, etc.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

Mr. WORKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I am advised, however, that if present he would vote "nay" on this amendment, and as I intend to vote the same way I feel at liberty to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I understand that upon this question he would vote as I am about to vote, and so I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDWICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I have no knowledge as to how the Senator from New York, if present, would vote on this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Being in great doubt as to how that Senator would vote on this amendment, I decline to vote.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], but I am at liberty to vote on this amendment and vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote, unless it becomes necessary for me to vote in order to constitute a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who has been called out of the Chamber on official business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—9.

Borah	Jones	Smoot	Wadsworth
Clark, Wyo.	Smith, Mich.	Sutherland	Works
Hollis

NAYS—49.

Ashurst	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Kenyon	Oliver	Sterling
Broussard	La Follette	Overman	Stone
Chamberlain	Lane	Page	Swanson
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Tillman
Colt	Lewis	Pomerene	Vardaman
du Pont	Lodge	Ransdell	Walsh
Gore	McLean	Robinson	Williams
Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Sheppard
Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Shields
Hughes	Myers	Simmons

NOT VOTING—38.

Brady	Fall	McCumber	Shively
Brandegee	Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Burleigh	Goff	Owen	Thomas
Catron	Gronna	Penrose	Townsend
Chilton	Harding	Phelan	Underwood
Culberson	James	Reed	Warren
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Saulsbury	Weeks
Curtis	Kern	Shafroth
Dillingham	Lippitt	Sherman

So the amendment of Mr. WORKS was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri proposes an amendment, which the Secretary will state to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 2 of the bill by inserting, after the word "engineers," at the end of the section, in line 21, page 7, the following:

Provided, however, That before the permit shall be granted under this act the permittee must first obtain, in such manner as may be required by the laws of the States, the consent of the State or States in which the dam or other structure for the development of the water power is proposed to be constructed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the committee offers no objection to the amendment proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the amendment will be considered agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHILTON. I offer an amendment to strike out certain words after the word "applicant," on line 15, page 7, and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 15, after the word "applicant," it is proposed to strike out:

Which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed, or if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant—

And to insert:

Which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia strikes out an amendment which has already been adopted, and unless the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered, the Chair thinks the amendment can hardly be offered at this time unless by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the presentation of the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, that is not entirely a correct description of my amendment. It strikes out an amendment in part, but it relates to matters that are not stricken out. The bill as it is framed prescribes certain rules by which the Secretary of War may determine in case of a contest which one of the contestants shall be preferred. I think all of that is improper and that we ought not to go into that. I think the true criterion is to select the one who will offer the most favorable terms and will give the best public service for the least money. I hope the chairman of the committee will not object to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment must be put in some concrete form before it can be submitted to the Senate for adoption. At the present time the Chair thinks that it is not in that condition.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I understand that unanimous consent has been given to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To present the amendment; yes, sir.

Mr. CHILTON. Then I offer the amendment as read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will locate the amendment in the bill and will read the text as it will stand in the event the amendment is adopted.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, beginning in line 14, the bill reads:

Preference shall be given to that applicant—

The proposed amendment begins at that point, so as to read:

Preference shall be given to that applicant which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rate for public service under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill as a new section, to stand as section 15, the following:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to construct or cause to be constructed on the Potomac River the power plant outlined in project No. 3, House Document No. 1400, Sixty-second Congress, third session, including each and every detail and plan outlined and specified in said document or any of the exhibits, plans, and specifications attached thereto. And for such purpose the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to construct said project under his direct supervision or to enter into contracts for materials and labor for the construction of the same or any part of the same as, in his judgment, may be the most practical and economical, not exceeding a limitation of cost for all the items connected with and mentioned in said project, of the sum of $15,021,600: Provided, That the Secretary of War may, from time to time, modify or change any of the plans or specifications in said document as he may deem advisable or practicable for the better carrying out of the purposes of this legislation, and if in the judgment of the Secretary of War the object to be attained by said project can be better or more economically brought about he is hereby authorized to change the location of said dam or to build two or more dams instead of the one specified in said document.

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site for said dam or dams and for all other real estate necessary to the carrying out in detail of said project, including all real estate that will be overflowed by the formation of the lake mentioned in said project. And whenever in any case the Secretary of War is unable to acquire by purchase at a fair value any land, property, or property rights necessary to be acquired in the carrying out of said project, he is hereby authorized and directed, in the name of the United States, to begin and prosecute to final adjudication all necessary suits for the acquisition of such property in any court having jurisdiction.

In the construction of said project a separate account shall be kept of the expenditure necessary on account of the increased water supply for the city of Washington, and the expenditure on account of the power development, and one-half of the amount expended for the increase of the water supply of the city of Washington is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this amendment has for its object the construction of a dam on the Potomac River at or near the west line of the District of Columbia. The objects to be attained are two: First, to provide electricity for the use of the Government and the District, and also to provide an increased water supply for the city of Washington. The need and the practicability of the development of this great power, located 9 or 10 miles west of the city of Washington, I think, are apparent to all who have visited the scene and observed the possibilities.

Mr. President, between the District line and the Great Falls of the Potomac River there are great power possibilities. The water supply for the city of Washington costs the Government a great deal of money. It was recognized several years ago that if the city continued to increase in population the present supply of water would be inadequate for the needs of the people. This particular part of it is not so necessary now, because in the last few years the officials have been putting in meters, and have thereby decreased to a very great extent the consumption per capita of water in the District. But that an increased water supply will be necessary at some time in the not very distant future is acknowledged by everybody who has made any investigation of the subject. By combining these two projects the amount of money necessary to carry them out can be greatly reduced.

Congress had this in mind several years ago, when it passed, on the 26th day of June, 1912, an act containing this provision of law:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed, through the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, to investigate and report to Congress at the beginning of its next session on the questions of the present water supply in the District of Columbia and the sufficiency of its source at the Great Falls of the Potomac River to supply the present and future needs of the United States and of the District of Columbia for water; also the availability of the water power at said Great Falls or vicinity on the Potomac River, or between Great Falls and the District of Columbia, for the purpose of supplying light and power for uses of the United States and of the government of the District of Columbia, and to prepare complete plans, maps, specifications, and estimates for the production, distribution, and utilization of the maximum electrical power that can be economically created and employed for such uses, including street lighting in the District of Columbia; said plans, maps, and specifications shall be sufficient in detail to form the basis of a contract or contracts for the execution of the work, and the map, supplemented, if necessary, by a report, shall indicate all of the lands that are required to be taken or flowed and the water and water rights that are required to be taken for the purpose of the execution of the project. For expenses of this investigation and report, including all necessary expert and other personal services, there is appropriated the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Senators will notice that that became a law on the 26th day of June, 1912. In accordance with that provision of law the Secretary of War proceeded to carry out the instructions of Congress. I presume that in all investigations that have been made anywhere by the Government or other persons in regard to the examination of any stream for the development of power or any other project there never has been an instance where a more complete and detailed examination was made than was made in this case. In other words, the Government of the United States used $20,000 for the investigation of the development of power and the increase of the water supply at this point in the Potomac River. Some of the best hydraulic engineers of the world were employed. The engineers of the War Department made a very careful and minute survey of everything in detail, and made a very voluminous report. The document referred to in the amendment is the pamphlet I hold in my hand. In connection with it, however, detailed plans and specifications were made, as the law provided they should be made, in such detail that they could be used as a basis for persons to bid upon the project, if it were let to bidders. It is upon that report and the judgment of those engineers upon that investigation so made under the instructions of Congress that I have drafted this amendment and ask for its adoption.

The engineers examined, as far as the water supply was concerned, several different projects—three in number—made detailed surveys, and unequivocally recommended the one known in the document as No. 3, and the one referred to in the amendment. They made, as I have said, a very detailed examination of the power possibilities, and without hesitation recommended in the strongest terms that Congress should by law provide that the Secretary of War should begin this work. I will not have the time, and I do not suppose it would be desired even if I had the time, to go into all the details that have been gone into by these engineers.

The Potomac River, under prior laws, has been measured carefully as to its flow for a great many years; and that is the only feature of this report that casts any doubt upon its practicability. The river is not constant in its flow. Under the project as developed by these engineers there is a maximum of 99,500 horsepower. The figures that I have here indicate a minimum horsepower of 15,400. In this report on page 18 the engineer gives us a table. As I understand, this table is deduced from examinations and measurements made during a space of 15 years' time. Out of that 15 years he gets the average year, and then out of the average year he gives us the power possibilities of every day in the year.

In the average year, averaging the 15 years, there would always be developed a minimum horsepower of 15,400. There would be 300 days in the average year when there would be 27,500 horsepower developed. For 250 days in the average year there would be 37,000 horsepower. For 220 days there would be 47,700 horsepower. For 182½ days there would be 66,300 horsepower. For 159 days there would be 78,100 horsepower. For 128 days there would be 99,500 horsepower. For 105 days there would be 98,200 horsepower. For 58 days there would be 95,400 horsepower. For 32 days there would be 92,000 horsepower. For 20 days there would be 90,000 horsepower. For 14 days there would be 87,000 horsepower. For 2 days there would be 70,600 horsepower. For 1 day there would be 70,200 horsepower.

The particular project recommended provides for a dam across the Potomac River at or near the west line of the District of Columbia to a height, as I remember, of 115 feet. I know that when this project has been agitated there have been those who have opposed it because they supposed that the development of power out there would destroy the beauty of the falls. This particular project does not develop all of the power possibilities, but the engineers thought all that was necessary now and for quite a number of years. But in order to obviate any difficulty or objection that might come from those who deemed that the beauty of the falls ought to be maintained—because everybody knows that it is quite a beauty spot and is visited every year by many thousands of people—the particular project that they have outlined does not interfere with the falls proper, the dam being 9 miles from the falls, creating a lake 9 miles long running to the foot of the falls.

The engineers point out in the report that should Congress decide to do so they could get an additional fall of something over 30 feet by utilizing the falls, either by another dam or by constructing a small dam across the falls and conducting the water around and letting it drop into this lake through a water wheel. So that the figures I have given and all the figures given in the report could be increased in round numbers about a third if Congress desired to destroy the falls themselves. Between the foot of the falls and the District line there is sufficient fall in the river—enough rapids in the river—so that by building the dam as I have stated they could get the power I have indicated.

Now, the project—and it is included in the amount that is authorized in the amendment—provides for taking the water out of this lake, using part of the energy that is developed there to generate electric power for pumping the water over into a reservoir and conducting it through several reservoirs and some tunnels until it gets over north of the city to the present filter beds, through which all the water used in the city is filtered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice in the amendment of the Senator that certain figures are used, in the fourth line on page 2—$15,021,600. I presume that that is the estimate of the approximate cost of the improvement which he has outlined.

Mr. NORRIS. It is; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the Senator tell us from that report or from his own information just what power would be produced by this investment?

Mr. NORRIS. That I have already indicated. There would be, as I remember now, an average horsepower developed there of about 67,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is, a daily average?

Mr. NORRIS. A yearly average. It would sometimes be below that and sometimes above it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the report indicate what percentage of this output would be used by the Government in the ordinary transaction of their business at the present time?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it goes into the minutest detail. At the time the report was made—that is, a couple of years ago—Congress had authorized the construction of three buildings down on Pennsylvania Avenue just opposite the New Willard Hotel. We condemned three blocks there. They included the lighting and the power necessary to operate the elevators in those three buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the report concludes that it is an economical investment?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; without any hesitation. They give their figures in every case, showing upon what their estimates and their conclusions are based.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether this proposition, which he submits as an amendment to the pending bill, has been considered by a committee of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. In answer to the Senator I will say that I do not remember just how long ago, but somewhere in the neighborhood of two years ago I introduced a bill on the subject, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I think they will consider it whenever they have a meeting. They have not yet had one, as I understand. It was referred to a subcommittee, but no hearings were ever had on it.

Mr. ROBINSON. And no report or recommendation has ever been made by a committee of Congress upon the subject?

Mr. NORRIS. No committee of Congress has ever recommended this particular amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will say right there that I have an impression that the report which the Senator holds in his hand was based upon an authorization of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Arkansas was here when I stated it, but this report was made under instructions of a law of Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON. It contemplates, if I correctly read the amendment, an authorization of more than $15,000,000 for the construction of this dam and ancillary works.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks it practical or advisable to undertake to determine this question, relating to the advisability of authorizing the expenditure of that amount for the construction by the Government of a particular dam, upon a general bill of this character, without first having the matter considered and reported upon by a committee of Congress?

If the Senator will permit me a further statement, explanatory of my question, he can readily understand that it would seem to those of us who have not had an opportunity of studying the question as no doubt he has—his investigations of it having extended, as I take it from his statement, over a period of some years—that the matter should be considered and passed upon as an independent proposition and determined after very careful attention by the Congress. It does seem to me, if the Senator will permit a further statement, that it is not desirable to undertake to determine this matter at this time and either to preclude it or to adopt it as an amendment to this general bill.

I wanted to make that suggestion to the Senator, and to hear what he has to say upon that point. The bill now under consideration has been before the Senate for a great many days, to the exclusion of many other important matters pressing upon Congress for attention; and I wanted to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be better to let a committee of Congress investigate this proposition and report it in the regular way, rather than to seek to place it upon a bill of the character of that which we are now considering?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point?

Mr. NORRIS. First, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Arkansas. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator asked me a question at the beginning and I will answer it categorically. I say "yes" to his question. I think it is proper, under all the circumstances, to offer this amendment here and to put it on the bill without an investigation by a committee.

I recognize that there is force in what the Senator from Arkansas says, that what we ought to do in cases of this kind is to introduce an independent bill and have it referred to a committee, but the Senator will also recognize that sometimes we can not get a hearing. I am not particularly finding fault with the Committee on the District of Columbia, because during the last two years the business upon which Congress has been engaged has been of such a nature that it was almost impossible to get a hearing on anything of this kind. I asked for a hearing many, many times. I also asked for reports. The District Commissioners have reported on it often, and always favorably. The recent Secretary of War, as I understand, was not in favor of making a recommendation that Congress should pass this kind of a law now, because of the money involved in it.

In my humble judgment there is not any committee, either of the House or of the Senate, that can give to this question the investigation that these experts gave, and gave under our instructions. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Arkansas was here when I read the law that authorized this investigation, but we have appropriated $20,000 for the purpose, and the Secretary of War has employed experts and made an investigation which, in my judgment, is as careful and as full and as complete and as exhaustive as it would be possible for anyone to make.

I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that, of course, I have no expert knowledge. I have been out to the falls, and I have seen the vast quantity of water running away there. It seems to me like a sin not to have it do something for humanity while it is tumbling down that channel there, and it always appealed to me that Congress ought to do something in regard to it. I think it appealed to Congress in that way, and we passed that law. Now, after we have spent the money, after the best experts in the world have investigated the question and have said to us that the project was practical, and that it meant a great saving, I have no other recourse in my own mind, as long as the reports of all of these officials are the same, than to follow their judgment. I believe that a committee that might have this bill under consideration could not do much else than to get the opinion of experts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to suggest that improvements of our rivers and harbors are all predicated upon the reports of expert engineers.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the only question is whether this or that one shall be adopted at the time the appropriation is made. We never go into the technicalities of the situation at all.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We rely upon experts; and experts have blazed the way for this improvement, if it is considered desirable.

Mr. NORRIS. This report was made, of course, to Congress by the Secretary of War. Gen. Bixby, the Chief of Engineers, reported to him upon it. Lieut. Col. Langfitt had immediate charge of the investigation. One of the best hydraulic engineers in the United States, Mr. Hershel, was employed, and made a complete survey and a complete examination of every detail. As far as I am able to see, at least, there is not a possible place where they have not gone to the bottom of everything.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me to make a further brief statement, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has suggested the thought that was in my mind, and which I think I did not clearly state.

Any proposition which the Senator from Nebraska advances here is, of course, worthy of careful consideration by the Senate; but there are perhaps hundreds of recommendations that have been made for improvements the relative importance of which, as compared with this, Congress ought not to be required to determine under the circumstances under which we are called upon now to pass upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

I have understood for a long time that the Senator from Nebraska had devoted especial attention to this subject, and that he had decided views as to what action should be taken by Congress concerning it, and his views are strongly persuasive with me, as no doubt they are with every other Senator. But still, before embarking upon an enterprise which contemplates the expenditure in one local improvement of fifteen or twenty million dollars, I should think that Congress would want to consider the matter independently of the important general questions involved in this proposed legislation. I still think that the Senator from Nebraska should present a bill and let it takes its usual course, and that there can be no such circumstances surrounding this case as would warrant the Senate in authorizing this expenditure and at the same time excluding the many other recommendations, some of which may be relatively more important to the general interest of the country than the one now presented by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I said before, I think the only possible objection urged to this is the one the Senator from Arkansas has made. That is a question of procedure. I confess there is a good deal in what he says and that ordinarily it ought to be true. I would not offer the amendment here if I were basing it on my information, but I am basing all I say upon the report of experts, not only ordinary experts but experts who were employed by the Federal Government under a law of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Just permit me to proceed for a moment. I think that at the time we provided for this investigation we practically put the Government of the United States on record as favorable to it if the investigation was favorable, and that no one can doubt if he will examine this report; there is not any question but that this is something the Government ought to undertake. If it was only my opinion, and I was offering it as my own judgment, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas would be supreme, and that the matter ought not to be taken up yet, but I can not conceive——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I promised a while ago to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I had forgotten it. I beg his pardon. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire, and I will yield to the Senator from Ohio later.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply want to say that this matter was before the Committee on the District of Columbia long prior to the time when the Senator from Nebraska offered a bill, and there were conflicting opinions about the advisability of going into this great project on the part of that committee at the time when I was a member and the chairman of the committee.

Personally I have been greatly impressed with the report of Lieut. Col. Langfitt, who is a very competent officer and who made a very careful examination of this project. There were other projects, one known as the Layton project, I know, that were investigated. I think the general view has been that at some time the Government might well control that great power for the purpose of supplying water for the District of Columbia and for lighting and for other public uses.

Whether or not it is desirable to go into it at the present time and make it a part of this bill I myself will not undertake to offer an opinion. I have not taken any part in this discussion, and really I would not want to embarrass the bill, if this would embarrass it, on its final passage. But I think the Senator from Nebraska is engaged in a laudable work in connection with this matter, and at some time, and I hope during the Senator's membership in this body, this matter will be more seriously considered than it has been in the past. It is a great water power. It is a beautiful spot. Personally I should dislike exceedingly to have the beauty of it destroyed. I do not know whether this would do it or not.

Mr. NORRIS. This would not do it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not quite sure that there is a constant flow of water. I have been at Great Falls when it has been as turbulent as Niagara. I have been at Great Falls when the stream was pretty low.

Mr. NORRIS. I will state to the Senator that I said, probably before he came in, that, in my judgment, the only weak proposition in it all was that the Potomac River is not very constant. There are times when it comes down low and there are times when it gets too high.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I said, I have seen it when it was very low and when I should think an adequate supply could not be obtained unless there was some auxiliary method.

Mr. NORRIS. There would be an auxiliary power. We already have a steam auxiliary plant provided for, but in ordinary times it would be very seldom used. As I said, there will be a minimum of 15,400 horsepower.

Mr. GALLINGER. All I wanted to say, and I thank the Senator for giving me the privilege of saying it, is that the Committee on the District of Columbia had this matter under consideration to a greater or less extent covering a considerable period of years.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if it was not out of that consideration that came the passage of the law to which I have referred?

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly so. The committee were not satisfied in their own minds and decided then——

Mr. NORRIS. They wanted to have expert knowledge?

Mr. GALLINGER. They wanted expert knowledge, and the committee were quite willing and desirous that an appropriation should be made for the investigation. It looks to me as though it is a mere question as to whether this matter ought to go on the bill or not, and on that point I will not offer an opinion.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have in the past given some attention to the development of this proposition, and I confess I am one of those who would like to see that power plant established there, but I do not think it is quite right to ask the Senate to attach it as an amendment to a general bill. I can not conceive of any other project anywhere in the United States which ought to be attached to a general bill of this character. I do not believe that Senators generally have given to this project that attention which would justify them in voting for an authorized expenditure of $15,000,000. I certainly hope that the Senator from Nebraska will present this in the form of a separate bill at some time when it can be considered upon its own merits, but I doubt the wisdom of trying to amend the bill by attaching this project to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the Senator from Ohio has made practically the same suggestion as that made by the Senator from Arkansas, and I have great respect for opinions of that kind, I wish to say just a few words along that line.

I think it is apparent to every Senator that if this were in a separate bill it would be impossible to get it up for consideration, for large bills like this one and appropriation bills and so-called administration measures and all such things as that are going to take up more time than Congress is going to be able to devote to them. We are going to fall short with such measures, and while you can get some little bill through that has no authorization or appropriation when you come to one as great as this, unless it would be a part of what is ordinarily known as an administration program, it has been impossible in the last two years and it will be impossible in this session and the next to get it through. As I said before, if all the committees of Congress put together started into the consideration of this proposition, unless they happened to have, and probably some of them would have, some good engineers, we would not be able to go to the bottom of it. Like the Senator from New Hampshire said, they would have to seek expert advice. As he stated, this project was before the committee, it has been argued some in Congress occasionally for a good many years, and the committee thought, and wisely thought, that it is a question which will require the advice and the opinion of experts, and even those experts will not be qualified to give an opinion until they have made exhaustive surveys and examinations.

So in 1912 or 1913 Congress passed the act providing for the submission of the question to such experts, and for the giving of the opinion on behalf of the experts, and this opinion which we have now before us cost the Government of the United States $20,000. I do not know of anything in my experience and examination since I have been in public life where Goverment officials more zealously and honestly and fairly went into the details of a proposition to get the exact truth.

Now, Senators say we ought not to tack it on this bill. For practical purposes, unless it is put on some bill like this, it means a delay of a good many years before we will get to it. Senators know at the time this examination was begun it was apparent, and I had various reports showing it to be true, that the water supply of the District was getting low and that something must be done to get more water; that the present source of supply, the means of getting it from above Great Falls, where we get the present water supply, was not sufficient. At that time there were very few meters in use. Since that time we have provided for the use of meters, and meters are installed now, I think, in all residences and business houses, practically, of the city. That immediately brought about the saving of a large quantity of water that before had gone to waste. So, as far as the water supply is concerned in the District, it is not urgent, but, in my judgment, until we get to a time when we find the people suffering for water we will not get legislation of this kind unless we put it on some one of the great bills that must go through Congress.

Now, why should it be on this bill? Let us see how appropriately it can be applied here. This is a bill providing for the building of dams in navigable streams. We are providing in this bill that private corporations may build dams for the purpose of irrigation and for the purpose of power, for manufacturing or anything. Here is the Government of the United States, the Capital itself, within sight of a water supply—I believe one of the finest power propositions in the United States. It is not near as large, it is true, as a good many others, but it is a magnificent power site. The Government of the United States is using immense quantities of electricity for light and power in all the great Government buildings.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. Here right at our door lies the possibility, as our own men following our own laws have told us, of cutting the expense in two, besides being a great proposition of conservation. I think if the expense were the same we ought to develop this power. I am not sure but what it would be a good object lesson even if it cost more to develop it.

Now, this is the Government. We are dealing with the Government's property. We are dealing with a franchise here on navigable streams to private corporations. Why in that kind of a bill should we not, if we ever intend to do it, say, "Let the Government here construct this particular dam and install this power"? It seems to me very appropriate that it should be done on this bill.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When I sought to interrupt the Senator he was referring to the power in large quantities which is used by the Government in the city of Washington. I was going to ask the Senator if he has any information as to how much power the Government of the United States uses in the public buildings and how much power is used in the city for lighting purposes and for running street cars.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I can give the Senator the information. I tried to find that out at the time I was investigating the subject. This information is nearly two years old. I tried to find out exactly how much power is used in the city of Washington for all purposes, and I itemized it as much as I could.

We have, as you all know, two street car companies here, the Capital Traction Co. and the Washington Railway & Electric Co. At the time that I made my investigation the Capital Traction Co. was using 10,400 horsepower.

Then the city is lighted by the Potomac Electric Power Co. The ownership of the Potomac Electric Co. and the Washington Railway & Electric Co., I understand, is practically the same. I think the stock of one owns the other, or, at least, they are very closely connected. If not owned that way, then the individuals who own the stock in one own it in the other.

The Potomac Electric Power Co. used for street lighting in the District 4,000 horsepower.

The power supplied to the United States at that time by this company was 1,040 horsepower.

Electricity supplied for commercial light and power, 12,760.

The power for street railways, 24,600 horsepower.

The United States itself was generating at that time 5,700 horsepower.

So at that time there was a total horsepower used by the United States Government of nearly 7,000. I think I can give it accurately. It is 6,740 horsepower. I think that answers the question of the Senator from New York.

There was a total maximum power used in the city of 58,100. So that I may not afterwards be accused of making any misrepresentations, I will state that this does not include private corporations or parties who are generating power for elevators or for light for themselves. I understand some of the larger establishments in this city as well as in a good many other cities have a little power plant of their own, and they make their own electricity and operate their own elevators. Nothing of that kind is included here.

I could go on, Mr. President, at almost any length. I do not want to weary the Senate with this matter. I do not know that it would be valuable if I undertook to give details in regard to the various propositions involved.

Briefly, in round numbers, one-third of this $15,000,000 is what the engineer estimates it will cost for the additional water supply. So, in round numbers, there are about $10,000,000 that will be properly chargeable to the power proposition and about $5,000,000 to the increase of the water supply of the District. The engineers detail just how much the cost will be. For instance, they estimate the spillway dam, $2,502,000; intake dam and power house, $4,163,000; relocation of Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and electric railway, $1,849,025; land and water rights, $1,500,000; engineering and omissions, $585,975.

Col. Langfitt in his report analyzes the cost per kilowatt hour, and he estimates it in various ways. I do not believe I will take the time to read it all in detail, but he takes the amount invested and assumes that money is worth 6 per cent. Then he cuts the price nearly in two that we pay, and it pays back, as I remember it now, somewhere in the neighborhood of 47 or 50 years, every cent we have invested of the total cost.

Then he says:

> If interest and sinking-fund charges are omitted, as seems to be the case in some of the costs given by Lieut. Bain, the cost per kilowatt hour is at once reduced from 8.04 to 3.1.

Even counting the interest in at 6 per cent, the cost per kilowatt hour of this electricity is less than 1 cent. If you do not take in 6 per cent interest, it is reduced to 3.1 mills; in other words, in round numbers, one-third of a cent per kilowatt hour.

> It is evident that no steam plant can approach this figure in cheapness of production.

This estimate includes the building and everything that is necessary to the building of fine substations in the city, all fireproof, and all of them of the most modern possible construction.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. Probably in that connection it might be well to say that I have been informed by persons who claim to know that the present rate per kilowatt hour here is 10 cents.

Mr. NORRIS. To the private consumer and the private residence it is 10 cents.

Mr. JONES. Do I understand from that that it can be reduced under this power plant to less than a cent?

Mr. NORRIS. To less than a cent. That, however, does not include the cost of distribution. That produces the electricity and brings it down to the substations located in different parts of the city. I have not from this report, but from reports from other cities, a great deal of information about the distribution of electricity. There is no doubt but what it could be sold, and sold at a profit, at 3 or 4 cents per kilowatt hour to the private consumer.

Mr. President, as I said before, it is mainly a question that is expert in its nature. The opinion is here of the men whom we employed to make the investigation. While I could go into detail at great length as to every particular phase of this subject, I doubt whether the Senate would care for me to discuss a technical proposition, as to which I could give only the opinion of the engineers, when I have already briefly given in every case the opinion of the men who made the investigation and have stated that the engineers recommend, without hesitation, that the Government should undertake the work and should carry out the proposition that is outlined in the document.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this amendment ought not to be adopted. Here is a general bill, dealing generally with the question of the development of navigation in connection with power. There has been no attempt in this bill to select any particular place for improvement; there has been no attempt in this bill to appropriate or to authorize the appropriation of a cent for any purpose. The bill is general in its character and applies equally to every section of the country.

Mr. President, I know of a number of places where appropriations have been authorized and made by Congress where the Secretary of War has had the investigation made, where the Board of Engineers have made their report, with estimates of cost, and so forth, and recommended the improvements for adoption. Now, I would ask the Senator from Nebraska if he would like to have all of those put into this bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the Senator give me an instance now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. President, four years ago Congress made an appropriation and appointed a special board to investigate the Muscle Shoals of the Tennessee River. They devoted three years to the work under that provision. The last Congress made an additional appropriation of $150,000 for that investigation, it being one of the greatest projects perhaps in this country. They have made a most thorough investigation; they have spent that money investigating the foundations and making surveys of overflowed land. They have unanimously made their report to the Secretary of War, strongly urging that the appropriation be made. Now, would the Senator let that come in this bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BANKHEAD. First, answer my question.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to answer the Senator's question, but I want to get a little more information. The Senator will not object to giving me information, will he?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Surely not.

Mr. NORRIS. If he remembers, the Senator said the other day that he could give me information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think I could on this question.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator can on this question, and I am trying to get that. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if that was not on a river and harbor bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. What?

Mr. NORRIS. The money which was appropriated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; that was for the purpose of making these streams navigable, was it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and in connection with power, just as this general bill provides for power.

Mr. NORRIS. But that was not a power bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, it was not specifically a power bill; and neither is this. This is a bill to provide for the improvement of navigable rivers and to build dams for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. But the real object of this bill is to develop power. Now, I will answer the Senator's question. I was of the opinion that the Senator would refer to Muscle Shoals. I do not have the information that he has about it, but in a general way I understand it is one of the greatest power possibilities in the world.

I had a letter from one of the constituents of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] in charge of this bill calling my attention to the particular proposition while this debate was going on. He suggested that I offer an amendment such as the Senator now suggests, that we make this development for the purpose of making nitrates by the Government in order to prepare ourselves for war. The proposition that I have made has not anything to do with navigation, except that it will make a nice lake, probably, for pleasure boats.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the Senator will answer my question.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to answer the Senator. The Senator's reference is to an improvement where they were proposing to increase navigation. If the Senator will offer an amendment to this bill providing that the Government shall develop the power possibilities at Muscle Shoals for the purpose of making nitrates and thus helping the great preparedness scheme, I will vote for it most heartily.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am glad to hear that declaration of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Alabama thinks that this amendment is completely out of place in this bill, why does he not take the judgment of the Senate by moving to lay it on the table?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I want to say that under no circumstances would I vote to add Muscle Shoals to this bill; but I promise the Senator from Nebraska that before this Congress adjourns he will have an opportunity to vote for just such a proposition as he has suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let us get it right. The Senator will probably come in here with a proposition to make a stream navigable and have the Government develop it and build a dam. I am willing to build a dam for the purpose of developing power and to let the Government use it.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. KENYON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. NORRIS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair as on the former vote, and will not vote unless my vote is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). Because of my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] I withhold my vote.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is necessarily absent from the Chamber.

My colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] is also unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has not voted. I transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—30.

So the amendment of Mr. NORRIS was laid on the table.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have presented as an amendment to this bill 20 additional sections, comprising the river-regulation bill which I have been urging for many years. That bill would admirably fit in with this bill, provided the bill was so modified as to make the waterway commission consisting of the President and the Secretaries of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce, provided for in the amendment, the granting power of the permits in place of the Secretary of War alone, as contemplated in the pending bill. It would provide a complete scheme of legislation covering every waterway in the country and every watershed, not only the main rivers but their tributaries and their source streams. It would provide for coordination of the scientific services which now have jurisdiction over the various phases of the water question, including navigation; it would provide for cooperation between the National sovereignty and the State sovereignties so as to secure the union of their forces in plans and works, thus avoiding the contradictions and the antagonisms of the present system; it would take care of work in each watershed, so that the work in the various watersheds would proceed contemporaneously, and no particular watershed would be favored over another; it would develop the river not only for water power, as in the pending bill, but for navigation, reclamation of arid and swamp lands, development of forests, promotion of intensive cultivation, and so arrest and restrain the waters falling from the heavens and making their destructive way to the oceans and gulfs as to mitigate the floods and turn them, as the President so aptly remarked, from a menace into a blessing; it would provide an ample fund for continuous work—$60,000,000 annually for a period of 10 years. This amendment is entirely germane to the bill, and, in my judgment, ought to be adopted; and it would be a speedy consummation of the desires of all those who are now working upon detached portions of this great question.

For instance, with reference to the Potomac River, the project which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has presented: There the engineers have applied themselves simply to two phases of the water question on the Potomac River. One relates to the water supply of Washington and the other to the development of water power, the former costing about $10,000,000 and the latter $5,000,000. The amendment which I urge would not only provide for that, but would provide for much more. The inquiry into the water supply of Washington and the electric light and power supply of Washington is only one phase of the Potomac question. The real way to take hold of the Potomac River is to regard it as a unit, from its sources to its mouth, and provide not only for the water-supply development and the water-power development contemplated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, but every phase of the water question, including the purification of the river itself, the general development of the water power, the use of the water for intensive cultivation, as well as the supply of towns and cities along its banks.

As it is Washington expends an extraordinary sum every year in the purification of water. All the inhabitants along this river are permitted under present conditions to empty anything into the river, and the filth comes down to Washington, and there it has to be taken hold of by a filtering process and purified at an enormous expense. It would be a much cheaper and a much better way to take hold of the question of the purification of the river right at the very sources of these streams, by cooperative legislation with the various States, and prevent the river from being thus defiled.

As it is, a very large proportion of the water which is thus filtered in Washington—one seventy-fifth of the entire amount, amounting to 2,000,000 gallons daily—is used simply in condensing steam at the great Government Printing Plant. In other words, we take the dirty water, which would be perfectly useful for this purpose, and go through the enormous expense of filtering it in order to apply it to the plant of the Government Printing Works for purposes of condensation. And so it goes. All along the line we have this improvident, inefficient, insufficient method of control, increasing expense and producing a condition out of which we will perhaps gradually blunder over a period of years at a cost far exceeding the cost of taking hold of the river in its entirety and, with the cooperation of the States affected, treating it for every beneficial and profitable purpose as well as for navigation.

Mr. President, I am aware that the appropriation sought by this amendment staggers a great many. All I have to say upon that subject is that we must accustom our minds to big sums if we ever intend to enter upon constructive work. We have been passing through a period of correctional legislation for years—beneficial, I have no doubt, but temporarily disturbing—and it is about time that we were entering upon some constructive work.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I simply wish to inquire if the Senator's amendment has been offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment is pending. The adoption of that amendment is the pending question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was saying that it would be necessary for us to enter upon constructive work; and the great constructive works that are reaching out before us are those relating to the regulation of rivers and the full conservation and development of our water resources, as well as the construction of public buildings and works.

We ought to expend about $30,000,000 annually in public buildings under some plan other than the present spoils system. We ought to expend at least $60,000,000 annually upon our rivers, and it hardly seems that that is a big sum when we contrast it with the sums that are spent in other directions. Sixty million dollars annually for rivers and $30,000,000 annually for public works and buildings are not very large sums in comparison with the total revenue of the Government, reaching over a billion dollars. We are contemplating with equanimity an increase in our military expense from $250,000,000 annually to $350,000,000 or $400,000,000 annually. It seems to me that if we can make so large an advance in our expenditures intended for destruction we can at least provide for the expenditure of $60,000,000 or $100,000,000 annually for construction. We are viewing with calm the one expenditure, and yet are alarmed about the other; and the very men who are full of caution regarding this expenditure are talking with confidence of taking over the entire railway system of the country, involving an expenditure of over $15,000,000,000 and necessitating an annual expenditure, probably, in the development of our railroads of about $1,000,000,000—that being the estimate of Mr. Hill.

Before we enter upon this great work of Government ownership of our railways, which some think is impending, and which has so generally been adopted elsewhere, is it not wise for us to convince the country that we can take hold of a moderate public work and conduct it ably and with profitable financial results? If we treat the water question comprehensively, we will turn water from a liability into an asset. The flood waters of the country are now destroying about $200,000,000 in value annually. They inflicted a couple of years ago losses of about $50,000,000 upon the State of Ohio alone, and last year $25,000,000 upon the State of Kansas. Just to take hold of and control these waters with a view to saving or mitigating that loss would be a profitable undertaking. When, in addition to that, we provide a perfect instrumentality for interstate transportation, coordinating with rail and ocean carriers; when we use this water in a compensatory way for the development of water power, for the reclamation of arid lands, for the reclamation of swamp lands, and direct it and control it for intensive cultivation and for the development of forests we are adding just so much to the great wealth of the country, and we are adding every year to the income of the country, and we are adding a sum far in excess of the interest upon the investment which we propose; and yet my friend from Mississippi calls this suggestion the suggestion of a dreamer.

Why, Mr. President, I insist that I am the most practical man in this body. The expenditure of $60,000,000 annually, with reference to this great constructive work, does not stagger me for a moment. The expenditure of $100,000,000 annually would not stagger me. The expenditure of $150,000,000 annually would not stagger me. The prospect that this work is to go on forever would not stagger me. The judgment of a practical man should view this question just as it would view the development of our rail carriers, just as it would view the development of our ocean carriers—the latter two, in my judgment, being of course adequately taken care of by private capital; but it is utterly impossible for private capital to take hold of the regulation of our rivers. No one would tolerate the idea of turning over the absolute ownership and control of our rivers, and the waters flowing in them, to any private corporation. It is essentially a public work; and when the country is seriously considering acquiring property that does not partake of this character and utilizing it in the public interest, certainly those who view with equanimity such acquisition ought not to be staggered by the proportions of this amendment.

Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate upon this subject. I should have been glad to have had a vote upon my amendment, but I am sure, from the votes already had, that there is no disposition upon the part of the Senate to amend this bill materially. The Senate is intent, just as Congress has always been intent, upon taking hold in a detached way of a great problem and pushing it through without even dovetailing it with the bigger problems beyond. When the Senate has absolutely refused to enlarge the granting power here so as to cover not only the Secretary of War but the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce, who also have jurisdiction over important parts of the great water question, I can hardly expect that it will add this amendment to the bill, comprising, as it does, 20 sections.

I can only hope that the debate we have had upon this subject has been in some degree educational and instructive. I am aware—and it is perhaps best that it should be so—that long agitation is required, both in Congress and out of Congress, before a great measure can be adopted. Not only must the congressional mind be accustomed to the consideration of the measure, but the public mind itself must be, for it is probably to the credit of Congress that it follows public opinion, rather than controls it.

I do hope, however, that the illuminating exposition made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]—who has been for years contending that this great volume of water precipitated on the lower Mississippi from the mountains and plains of the upper Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Missouri should be treated as a national question—will have the attention that it deserves. I am sure that his demonstration was a perfect one, and I am glad to know that he has released himself from the very narrow and contracted view which he has hitherto held, and which it was probably necessary for him to hold in order to meet the demands of his constituents, for I do not believe that the people of the South have yet loosened their belts for action.

They have been so intent upon the black question that they have not had vision for the larger problems that involve the entire Nation; and they have been so overwhelmed with difficulties in their local conditions, arising out of the race question and the problems growing out of it, that it is not to be wondered at that their vision has not extended beyond their own boundaries. But they are now appealing for national help, and we of the mountains and of the great plains insist that they should enlarge their horizon; that if the National Government is to be called upon to take care of the lower Mississippi, it is called upon to take care of the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and the Arkansas to their remotest sources, for these waters are elusive things. Drunk up from the ocean, carried by the clouds over the mountains and plains, precipitated there, forcing their way through the small streams and the small tributaries into the large streams, making their way to the destruction of communities and large cultivable areas, yet it is the greatest asset that the American people have, an asset which, if developed, will be productive of the largest wealth. So we insist upon it that as to the lower Mississippi River the problem is not simply to hem in that stream by the erection of levees upon both sides and by protecting the banks through bank revetment, but that one part of the problem is to delay and obstruct the waters in getting down to that point, and the real beneficial use of the waters as an asset of the country is above and not below. The destructive application of the water is below; the beneficial use of the water is above; and we insist upon it that it is just as much a national problem to protect the beneficial uses of the water above as it is to mitigate the terrors of the application of the floods below.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say one thing with reference to the Democratic Party. It has been in power now for three years. Look over its platform and see what it says regarding the waterways——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will yield for the purpose, I wish to make a motion to take a recess.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow; and I wish now to announce that when the Senate does meet I shall ask that it remain in continuous session until the bill under consideration is disposed of. I shall insist on that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is executive business on the table that ought to be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. SHIELDS. I withdraw the motion for a recess, and move that when the Senate does take a recess it shall be until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Missouri to withhold that motion for a moment to permit me to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will withhold the announcement of the result. The Senator is always in order. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, during the session to-morrow, if the opportunity presents, I desire to submit some observations raised by the introduction of resolutions here pertaining to travel upon armed ships of belligerents which have not heretofore been discussed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ayes have it. The motion is agreed to. The Seargeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3873) to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3144) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further transmitted resolutions of the House on the death of Hon. S. A. WITHERSPOON, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 755. An act to incorporate the Boy Scouts of America, and for other purposes;

H. R. 759. An act to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in place thereof;

H. R. 4724. An act authorizing the Department of Commerce to make original investigation and research concerning forms and processes of manufacture, and for other purposes;

H. R. 4746. An act granting the city of Portland, Oreg., the right to purchase certain lands for public park purposes;

H. R. 8028. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911;

H. R. 9225. An act granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties;

H. R. 9691. An act authorizing leave of absence to homestead settlers upon unsurveyed lands;

H. R. 10032. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa.;

H. R. 11416. An act to repeal an act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States,' approved August 1, 1888";

H. R. 11628. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River; and

H. J. Res. 68. Joint resolution to cede to the State of Maryland temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Fort McHenry Military Reservation.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Local Union No. 179, United Garment Workers of America, of Whitefield, N. H., praying for an investigation into the manufacture and sale of dairy products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the New Hampshire State Equal Suffrage Association, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6.

CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
M. E. BURKE,
C. A. SULLOWAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to

PEND OREILLE RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3144) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington, which was to strike out lines 3 to 11, inclusive, and insert:

That Pend Oreille County, State of Washington, and the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, Pend Oreille County, Wash., their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized, jointly or separately, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pend Oreille River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between said towns, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 759. An act to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in place thereof;

H. R. 9225. An act granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties;

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, let Thy blessing descend in all its strength and fullness upon us, that these Thy servants may be profoundly sensible of the great responsibility laid upon them; that with clear perceptions, pure motives, and high resolves they may take up the work of the hour, and grant that the results of their deliberations may be in consonance with the genius of the great Republic whose interests they would serve and whose rights they would preserve, that peace, harmony, and good will may obtain through Him who taught us to avoid strife and live peaceably with all men. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1916.

Mr. SPEAKER: Desiring to be absent for a time from my office, I hereby designate J. C. South, Chief Clerk, one of my assistants, to act in my official capacity during my absence.

Very respectfully,
SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House.

The SPEAKER. As this is liable to be quite an exciting day, the Chair appeals to Members of the House to keep their seats and refrain from conversation, and to the galleries to refrain from conversation, because a very little talk on the part of each one, with the large number of people in the galleries, makes it difficult to conduct the business. Manifestations of assent or dissent in the galleries to what anyone says on the floor of the House is forbidden, and if it is attempted the Speaker will have the galleries cleared.

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS OF BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 158 (H. Rept. 304).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consideration of H. Res. 147; that there shall be four hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD, and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. COOPER; that at the conclusion of said general debate the said resolution shall be considered under the general rules of the House.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this resolution be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, 45 minutes of that time to be controlled by myself and 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the two gentlemen if it is the understanding that at the end of that hour and a half the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. POU. I would like to have that agreement.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, that was not in the agreement.

Mr. POU. That was not in the agreement. Of course, it is expected that the gentleman who closes the debate on this side will move the previous question. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that debate on this rule be limited to one hour and a half; 45 minutes to be controlled by himself and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and at the end of that time the gentleman from North Carolina will move the previous question.

Mr. POU. No, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will close the debate on this side, and move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that debate continue an hour and a half, as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d day of February a resolution was introduced in the House by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE], requesting the President "to warn all American citizens within the borders of the United States or its possessions or elsewhere to refrain from traveling on any and all ships of any and all powers now or in future at war, which ship or ships shall mount guns, whether such ships be frankly avowed a part of the naval forces of the power whose flag it flies or shall be called a merchant ship or otherwise, and whether such gun or guns or other armament be called offensive or defensive; and in case American citizens do travel on such armed belligerent ships they do so at their own risk." This is, of course, not all of said resolution, but I think I have quoted the most important part. Almost immediately this resolution, known as the McLemore resolution, was telegraphed to the capitals of the nations now at war. At that very moment the President and the State Department were conducting negotiations and engaging in diplomatic conversations with the nations at war for the purpose of settling the question of the rights of American citizens to travel upon the ships described in the McLemore resolution. I think I may even say that a friendly agreement was in sight with the American contention almost agreed to by the central powers. It also developed that telegrams were sent to the capitals of these warring nations expressing the opinion that if the McLemore resolution or any similar resolution ever came to a vote in the House of Representatives the same would be adopted by an overwhelming vote.

It is well known that this Government had insisted and was insisting that Americans had the right to travel upon ships armed for defensive purposes, inasmuch as such right had been exercised for centuries under international law recognized by the civilized nations of the world.

At the time of the introduction of this resolution two of the great powers now at war had informed neutral powers of their determination to attack without warning after February 29 all armed vessels of their enemies, even though such vessels might be merchant ships armed for defensive purposes.

It is well known that the President and Secretary of State insist that no nation has the right to attack merchant ships armed for defensive purposes; that if such attack is made advance warning shall be given and opportunity afforded for escape without loss of life of noncombatants traveling on said ships.

Very industriously the statement was published in foreign capitals that Congress was not with the President in his contention. It was announced that this McLemore resolution would pass this House by a large majority. The result was an immediate paralysis of all efforts of the President and State Department to secure recognition of American rights under international law by some of the nations at war.

On the 29th of February the President, knowing that the McLemore resolution was pending, learning that the charge was being circulated in foreign capitals that Congress would, upon a vote, repudiate the American contention, asked the Committee on Rules to take such action as would insure an early vote. The President believed the charges to be false, but the very fact that they were being industriously published and circulated was the cause of very damaging misunderstandings in our relations with some of the nations at war.

The McLemore resolution has been and is the cause of these misunderstandings. The Committee on Rules has therefore felt justified in reporting the resolution which I have presented in order that this House, after liberal debate, may by its vote let the world know whether we stand with the President or whether it is true that House resolution 147, introduced by the gentleman from Texas, has the support of the majority. A vote on this resolution raises the question. In no other way can this House answer the charges which the President believes to be false. In no other way can the charge be answered that this resolution would pass if a vote is taken.

And, Mr. Speaker, what is the contention of the President? It is that ships not intended to participate in war, ships engaged in peaceful commerce, merchant ships, liners, upon which Americans are traveling shall not be attacked without warning. The President demands of all the warring nations that they shall not endanger the lives of Americans traveling upon ships upon which they have the right to travel. He demands of these warring nations that they shall not murder Americans without warning. He is standing for a right never seriously questioned, but which the McLemore resolution proposes to withdraw, never challenged by civilized men anywhere before the present great war. And, Mr. Speaker, the question is now raised whether the nations at war shall determine what rights the citizens of a neutral nation possess—whether that question shall be determined by the law of nations agreed upon by civilized people everywhere long before this, the greatest of all the nations, was born. Think of the very audacity of the thing, if you please. Shall Americans exercise their rights under the law, or shall Germany or Austria be permitted to say just how and under what circumstances Americans shall travel? If that is to be the conclusion of this controversy, then for God's sake let us tell our own people to get their passports in future from some foreign Government and not from our own State Department. Has the thirst for blood made men crazy? Why slaughter noncombatants at all, and, in the name of a merciful God, why kill them without warning? Why should the submarine be permitted to slip up upon its prey in the dark and take innocent lives—lives of women and children—without a minute's warning? Oh, Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the sinking of the Lusitania, except to say that, thank God, nothing like it ever happened in civilized warfare before, and all good men pray it will never happen again; but one remark of one American who lost his life because of that crime reminds us of what the President has fought for during all these months—what he is fighting for now. After that ship, loaded with neutrals firm in their faith that the Christianity and civilization of this century would protect them against attack without warning, had received her death wound this American said to a companion, "Let us go and look after the kiddies." But that American went down along with some of the American "kiddies" he was trying to save; and that is the burning issue right now. You may try to escape it as you will, but the plain, unvarnished truth is, it is proposed to commit this Lusitania crime over again, and this McLemore resolution would have us say, "All right; kill, murder, by slipping up in the night; they went on these merchant ships at their own risk."

Mr. Speaker, I would be ashamed of my membership in this House if I thought it would indorse such policy.

Just a few things more.

No President save Abraham Lincoln ever occupied such a trying position as Woodrow Wilson. He has been so earnest in his efforts to keep us out of this war that not a few have said he was surrendering too much. He does not want war and he does not expect we will become involved in this war, but if you want to make war probable just throw him down in his fight for this admitted, undisputed right of American citizens. No; he does not want war, and nobody who has watched this man's course ought to say he does. Fools, liars, particularly those who are willing to misrepresent him to gain political advantage, may possibly bring this charge. He does not want war, but he is not willing to surrender part of the sovereignty of this Nation to prevent it. He will never involve us in war. If war comes, you may be dead sure it will be forced upon us when every honorable alternative has failed. You can bring us a little nearer a break by throwing him down in his efforts to uphold our admitted rights. Let not the American House of Representatives be a party to such a crime. [Applause.]

Is Woodrow Wilson alone in his stand? Thank God, no! I believe the American people are behind him. At least two Americans think he is right in the present controversy. They are both great men and they are both good men. They differ from him upon many questions, but not upon this. Do you think it means nothing that upon this question of warning Americans not to take passage upon merchant ships both Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Taft stand squarely with the President?

The course of Mr. Taft since he laid down the great office of the Presidency has been characterized by the finest taste and the very loftiest patriotism. [Applause.] These three men all agree upon this question. I repeat, does that mean nothing? I believe the American people will sustain the President and these two patriotic ex-Presidents in demanding that all the world, whether at war or at peace, respect the rights of American citizens. Any other course would bring down upon us, and justly bring down upon us, the contempt of all the world. [Applause.]

Just one word in conclusion. Perhaps it is a repetition of what I have already said. I feel that a deep injustice has been done the President—the suggestion that he wants war. No; he does not want war. He does not expect war. He does not expect that diplomatic relations with any nation will be broken off. These things may come; nobody can tell, but the President does not expect either war or the breaking of our diplomatic relations. [Applause.]

The charge that the President wants war is mean and contemptible, and all the imps of hell never devised a bigger lie. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to discuss this question in the way it should be discussed. The hour has come when you must decide whether the Stars and Stripes mean anything to Americans—whether it shall mean full protection according to law wherever it flies to all Americans everywhere or whether it shall be lowered at the behest of nations at war.

I predict that the verdict of this House will be rendered before the sun goes down sustaining the President, because his position is right—right under international law and right before Almighty God. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the question first to be considered to-day will be upon the previous question on the rule. If the previous question be voted down, I shall offer the following substitute which simply warns American citizens of the danger of taking passage on armed ships of nations at war:

Strike out all after the word "debate" where it last occurs and insert the following:

"The resolution and preamble shall both be open to amendment with the following amendment considered as pending, to wit:

"Strike out both the preamble and the resolution and in sert in lieu thereof the following:

"'Resolved, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives citizens of the United States under existing conditions and irrespective of their legal rights ought to refrain from taking passage on armed vessels of belligerent nations,' and the consideration of the resolution and amendments thereto shall proceed under the five-minute rule to a final vote on its passage."

This substitute does not go into all the questions raised by the McLemore resolution, and it brings the House of Representatives to a vote on the propositions upon which the President of the United States has asked the Congress to give full discussion and to express its opinion. If the previous question be not voted down, then, at the end of four hours of general debate, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will move to lay the McLemore resolution upon the table, and the House will not be able to express itself upon the main issue. That is the parliamentary situation. The House of Representatives, therefore, will not do what the President has asked, namely, give him its unqualified opinion on the question of warning American citizens not to ride on the armed ships of nations at war.

There is no great question of national right involved at this time. We are not confronted with a great crisis in which the honor of the Nation is involved at this moment. The only question is on the doubtful legal rights of the citizens of a neutral country to ride on armed ships of belligerents.

Mr. Speaker, the President warned American citizens to flee from war-stricken Mexico, and we appropriated money to aid them in their escape. Our Government limits the right of travelers in the war zones by restrictions on the issuance of passports. Citizens are not permitted to visit belligerent countries or pass from one belligerent country to another merely for "pleasure," "recreation," "touring," or "sight-seeing."

It is the undoubted right of an American citizen to remain in belligerent Mexico. It is the undoubted right of an American citizen to visit either or all the belligerent countries of Europe. That is not the question. The question of American rights was not the question involved when the Government issued its warning to those in Mexico and issues passports with restrictions to those purposing to travel in Europe. It is the question of how far American citizens shall exercise their personal rights to their own danger and the possible danger to their country.

It is not less dangerous to take passage on an armed belligerent ship than to remain in Mexico or to travel as a sightseer in the war zones of Europe.

I have here what purports to be the so-called secret orders of the British Admiralty with regard to the orders and instructions to armed merchantmen. They were published a few days ago for the first time in the United States. Merchantmen are directed in these instructions that it is important that submarines are not to be allowed to approach to short range, to which a torpedo or bomb launched without notice would almost certainly be effective. These merchantmen are instructed further that it may be presumed that any submarine that deliberately approaches or pursues a merchant vessel does so with hostile intention, and that in such cases fire may be opened in self-defense in order to prevent the hostile craft from closing to a range at which resistance to a submarine attack by a bomb or torpedo would be impossible.

That gives the order to a merchantman, armed, to open fire as soon as a submarine is seen approaching.

The difference between an armed merchantman, so acting, and an armed cruiser is not apparent to the average layman. The danger of taking passage on this sort of vessel was apparent to the administration as late as the 18th of January, 1916, when the Secretary of State, in a note to the foreign powers, said:

The use of submarines, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

It would therefore appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government, I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal right, which may be denied on account of new conditions.

I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration, conditioned upon their enemies making a similar declaration.

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

Does the President say, now, Will Congress to-day say, American citizens may ride upon an armed cruiser of a belligerent nation?

Suppose a German merchant vessel, armed with exactly the kind of equipment with which a British merchant vessel is armed, should sail from the port of New Orleans with a cargo of cotton, and include in her passenger list 100 American citizens. A British merchant vessel, armed just as the German vessel is armed, sails from Liverpool at the same time, carrying 100 American citizens among her passengers. These ships meet in mid-ocean and immediately upon sighting one another are so impressed with the danger of their situation that they open fire instantly for self-defense. The firing continues until both vessels are sunk, with the loss of all on board. Has the United States on this account cause for breaking diplomatic relations with both Germany and England, or has the United States cause for war against both Germany and England?

Mr. Speaker, Congress does not know all the President has done in his negotiations with foreign powers at war on the question before the House to-day; he says the introduction of a resolution in the House on February 22, 1916, warning American citizens not to take passage on belligerent ships has embarrassed him in his negotiations with warring nations on this question.

Mr. Speaker, I fear the President is not entirely frank with Congress. The letter of the Secretary of State to the warring powers dated January 18, 1916, takes the position that an armed merchantman is to all intents and purposes an armed cruiser, and the Secretary of State on that day advised foreign powers that our Government was contemplating issuing notice to American officials to treat these armed merchantmen accordingly.

What international question has arisen that has caused the administration to change its mind on the true character of an armed merchant ship, a question now so vital to our Republic and to the welfare of mankind? Both England and Germany have armed, and are arming, their merchant vessels ostensibly for defense. The Admiralty of England instructs her merchantmen to fire on approaching submarines before they get within the range of bombs or torpedoes. Those who contend for the niceties of international law must admit that that action on the part of the British Admiralty denies the right of search of merchant vessels and also makes futile international agreements that time shall be given for passengers and crew of merchant vessels to find safety before the ship is sunk.

Mr. Speaker, my fear is that the President is now undertaking to secure from Congress a reversal of the policy the administration laid down in the letter of January 18, 1916, with regard to the character of armed merchant vessels in which they are held to be auxiliary cruisers. The President is responsible for the conduct of international negotiations. Every belligerent power understands this provision of the American Constitution. The President does not hold the war-making power. The warring nations of Europe also understand this provision of our Constitution. If, therefore, even on the request of the President, Congress reverses the President's position on this question, by laying the McLemore resolution on the table, the war-making power assumes the burden of responsibility for the position taken.

Are the Members of this House to-day ready to say that American citizens shall without restraint exercise their doubtful legal right to take passage on the armed merchantmen of the nations at war? If so, are the Members of this House ready to take the next step and make a declaration of war on the nation that sinks an armed merchant ship upon which an American loses his life? To-day the question of national honor is not involved. The question of national rights is not involved.

The three citizens who sailed on Saturday on a merchant ship that is to be armed at Gibraltar said they enjoyed the thrill growing out of the danger. Are Members of Congress ready to declare war that such as these may have the thrills growing out of the danger they assume in taking passage on ships that are to all intents and purposes battle cruisers of nations at war?

For one, Mr. Speaker, I am not ready for war on any such grounds, and if the Executive refuses to warn American citizens of the danger they assume in taking passage on these ships, I shall vote, if I can make the opportunity to-day, to give all our citizens such a warning.

Mr. Speaker, when international differences arise there is a worship of punctilios that in its formality does not fit in with a republic. Reason and common sense are the safeguards of action rather than the observance of the niceties of the strictest punctilios, under which men are sometimes willing to go to war because they have demanded one formality and been offered another. Nations awake from the spell that worshiping these formalities brings over them as soon as bloody war begins.

This Nation, Mr. Speaker, is big enough, and strong enough, and patriotic enough to preserve its honor and at the same time the peace of the Nation, by warning its citizens of the danger of taking passage on armed belligerent ships of Great Britain, of Germany, of France, of Austria, or on the armed ships of any belligerent.

It is easier for this great neutral power to take that action in view of the changed condition of warfare than it is for either of the belligerent powers, fighting as they say they are for their very existence, to change the new methods of warfare in time of war.

England claims the right to arm her merchantmen. Germany claims the right of submarine warfare. It is not for us to decide for either in these particulars what its mode of warfare shall be, and to apply the old rules of international law to the present conditions is like putting new wine into old bottles.

Yesterday, day before yesterday, and for 19 months the belligerent nations of Europe have been sacrificing their citizens in a fury of human passion that is devouring the flower of every family in the warring countries. Hectatomb has followed hectatomb in this awful slaughter, until millions are numbered with the dead. This is the frightful situation of the belligerents, while we parley with them over the right of our citizens to travel for business or pleasure on their armed ships.

Under these conditions, do we not honor ourselves in the face of the world by placing some restraint on our passion for both business and pleasure? While millions die in awful war, we should at least warn our people from traveling on ships that are armed for either offensive or defensive war pending the war.

Let this Congress go on record to-day as issuing a solemn warning to the citizens of this country of the great danger they are in when they take passage on an armed belligerent ship. They owe this precaution to themselves, their families, and to their country. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, this is not a partisan question. It should not be made a partisan question. We should not meet it simply as members of the Democratic Party or as members of the Republican Party or of the Socialist Party, but we should look at the question from the standpoint of "America first." [Applause.] The issue is clear-cut and well defined although there are gentlemen here who have tried to confuse the issue and muddle the situation. Sirs, by your votes to-day on the rule for the previous question, or on the motion to table the resolution which will follow the adoption of the rule, you will say whether you propose to further embarrass and hamstring the President in the exercise of his constitutional right to conduct the diplomatic negotiations of this country, to the delight of certain foreign governments and their sympathizers in this country, or whether you will rise above the littleness of narrow partisanship and beyond racial influences to the heights of true patriotism and the satisfaction and pride of every red-blooded American. [Applause.] You can not confound the issue in this instance. You may offer your arguments as excuses for voting against the previous question on the rule, or the rule, but you know if the rule to-day is defeated the desire of the President to obtain a vote on the motion to table the McLemore resolution can not be granted, and when you do that, you, sirs, delight and send joy to the hearts of people in certain foreign capitals but you stab your own President in the back. [Applause.]

The President has come to us with a simple and just request. He has said that because of the uprising in this House last week the impression has gone to foreign countries that this House is for the McLemore resolution by a vote of about 3 to 1, and that because of those impressions he is being handicapped and embarrassed in his handling of the diplomatic affairs of this Government, and he requests us, as Americans, to remove those impressions by voting to table the McLemore resolution. Are you going to deny that simple request? Are you going to offer arguments, which are but excuses, over technicalities? He says that he will be satisfied with a vote on the motion to table the McLemore resolution. If that is what he asks for, why parley over details? The question involved here is bigger than that suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]—the warning of our citizens against traveling on armed merchant vessels. It is a question that vitally affects the future policy of this Nation. It is one that not only neutrals of to-day are interested in, but which affects posterity. Let me present it to you as concisely as possible in the few minutes I have allotted to me. Here is Germany, one of the belligerents, contending for certain privileges contrary to international law, namely, to expand for emergency military purposes her submarine warfare. I care not whether these contentions are reasonable or not; they are against international law, and it has been so held for 200 years, not only by the practices of nations but by the decisions of our own courts. To this contention England says no and protests against that military emergency upon the part of Germany. England at the same time, for military emergency purposes, is trying to extend a blockade affecting the trade and commerce of this country contrary to the rights of neutrals and international law. Their contention may appear reasonable, but Germany objects. They are both looking toward expanding the rights of belligerents and restricting the rights of neutrals.

If we concede the point to Germany in her contention, we must concede the point to England in her contention. The only difference is that England, by her violation of international law in carrying out her contention for a blockade, would destroy the property of our people, while Germany, through her contention for submarine warfare, would destroy the lives of American citizens. Sirs, the only safe course for us in this great crisis to pursue is to adhere, and adhere strictly, to the rights of neutrals guaranteed to them under international law. [Applause.] If we waver one way or the other, we are going to be placed constantly in "confusion worse confounded," that will bring about complications more delicate than yet have arisen so long as the war lasts. [Applause.] Sirs, international law now is the only pillar upon which we can securely lean, and when you allow one column of that structure to be removed you impair the strength and safety of our foundation and destroy the security of our position. [Applause.] Throughout this international crisis it has been the compass by which we steered our course. Let it be the standard by which we will measure our actions through the troubled waters of the future. It is the only safe and correct policy for us to pursue. [Applause.] Ah, but it is said that this contention upon our part will bring us into war. It has been whispered and hinted that the President wants to get us into war. How ridiculous is that assertion. Wants war! That man, who has not only preached peace but who has practiced and maintained peace. [Applause.] Wants war!

If he had wanted war did not Mexico offer sufficient excuse? Mexico practically invited us to war. And many of you on that side of the aisle contended then for intervention in Mexico. You criticized his course, but you could not drive him to war. No; he kept his head, patiently and calmly endured criticism, and remained imperturbed and undeterred, and to-day we are at peace with Mexico. [Applause.] Wants war! Those of you who entertain such thoughts or fears need only recall the sinking of the Lusitania, when helpless women, little babes, and strong men went to their graves in a bottomless sea, and humanity stood aghast and shuddered at the horror of that catastrophe. You will remember how the press of the country demanded that something be done to avenge the lives of those Americans. He asked the people to be patient, and just as they had faith and confidence in him then they have it now. [Applause.] It was a godsend that Congress was not in session at that time, because there can be little doubt that the carelessness and recklessness of certain Members here would have provoked a far graver situation than the one that confronts us to-day. [Applause.] The President promised the American people then that he would uphold the honor of the country and preserve peace if possible. He did both, and the people stood by him and approved his course. And to-day the question is whether you will stand by the President or against him. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for one I believe in responding fully and with entire frankness to the request of the President as to the attitude of Congress with reference to American citizens traveling upon armed belligerent merchantmen.

With Congress and it alone rests the power to declare war, and upon this diplomatic question submitted by the President to it it is well that we speak with great clearness.

In speaking one should lay aside all partisan, political, or personal feeling and view the situation with an eye single to the best interest of the country and with an honest purpose to best serve those whom he represents.

The true issues that are presented to the minds of the American people at this time, and particularly with reference to the discussion on this floor upon this resolution, are as follows:

First. May a merchantman of a belligerent nation arm purely for defense and be protected by international law from attack by war vessels of an enemy?

Second. If so, what is the status under international law of such vessel upon the seas?

Third. Shall American citizens be permitted, except at their own risk, to embark upon such armed belligerent merchantmen and travel within the zone of war?

Fourth. If injury comes to such citizen while so traveling upon such armed belligerent merchantmen, must it be regarded as a cause of war?

This discussion, Mr. Speaker, can only be fairly conducted while bearing in mind the tremendous consequences to the country if the last question shall be answered in the affirmative.

Within our borders are more than 100,000,000 souls who almost without exception pray to God for peace for their country—not peace at any price, but peace with honor.

The Nation is duly impressed with the horrors of the war being waged abroad, and is oppressed by the terrible gloom and sadness and despair which it causes and which hangs like a pall over the entire world.

Our people hear the cries of the fatherless and the widowed and see the tears and the bruises and the wounds of persons and nations that only the grave or the hands of time can efface.

We contemplate with sadness civilization and humanity lying prostrate and the hand on the dial of progress turned back to the days of savagery.

Religion, arts, industries, education, commerce, and the brotherhood of men are stricken down, until it all but seems that God has forgotten.

Blood and death and destruction and blasphemy and pillage and rapine and arson and murder, have taken the places of these helpful things of life.

The Man of Galilee is forgotten by those who wage war, and His doctrine of peace is scorned, and hatred is substituted for the benediction once given of "Peace on earth to men of good will."

It is these scenes that this Nation has in mind when it prays that no such carnage may desolate this land.

And the man who prays and who works and speaks for peace is neither craven nor poltroon, and many times evidences a courage much greater than would be required to face the cannon's mouth.

To-day I stand upon the floor of this House commissioned by 6,000,000 people of Illinois, and if the message which I deliver be not their thoughts, then I am ready to retire to private life bearing with me the conviction that I spoke my convictions.

I speak that the sons and the fathers and the husbands of those of my State shall not be needlessly exposed to the horrors and to the destruction of war.

The people of Illinois are not intoxicated with the profits that arise from placing in the hands of the battling forces—or at least one side—the fiendish instruments of destruction.

They are not filled with hate against either or any of the contending nations.

They are not frenzied by fear of invasion of their State, but they sit calmly and impartially anxious only that right may prevail, justice may be done, that national honor may be preserved, and that with these safeguarded peace, like the benediction of God, may continue throughout the land.

This, then, is the situation that I have in mind and these are the people for whom I speak in the discussion of this question.

The people of Illinois are desirous of standing by the President, of supporting his hands, of giving him comfort and assistance, and preserving untarnished all the luster of our flag.

The President asks, in substance, that the right of American citizens to travel upon armed belligerent merchantmen within the zone of war may be declared and upheld by the Congress of the United States.

With this request will be inseparably coupled by the American people the question not only of the right but also the question of the expediency of this course of conduct.

Let us consider these issues. The first is:

May a merchantman of any belligerent nation arm purely for defense and be protected by international law from attack by war vessels of an enemy?

There can only be one answer to this question, it seems to me. Under the long-established rule of international law, and that is within certain limitations, that such right does exist.

The Government of the United States, on September 19, 1914, at the commencement of the war abroad, took its position with the plainest declaration possible. It then said:

A. A merchant vessel of belligerent nationality may carry an armament and ammunition for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship of war.

B. The presence of an armament and ammunition on board a merchant vessel creates a presumption that the armament is for offensive purposes, but the owners or agents may overcome this presumption by evidence showing that the vessel carries armament solely for defense.

C. Evidence necessary to establish the fact that the armament is solely for defense and will not be used offensively, whether the armament be mounted or stowed below, must be presented in each case independently at an official investigation. The result of the investigation must show conclusively that the armament is not intended for and will not be used in offensive operations.

Indications that the armament will not be used offensively are:

1. That the caliber of the guns carried does not exceed 6 inches.
2. That the guns and small arms carried are few in number.
3. That no guns are mounted on the forward part of the vessel.
4. That the quantity of ammunition is small.
5. That the vessel is manned by its usual crew and the officers are the same as those on board before war was declared.

(Same to the British, French, and Japanese ambassadors in Washington, and the Belgian minister.)

6. That the vessel intends to and actually does clear for a port lying in its usual trade route or a port indicating its purpose to continue in the same trade in which it was engaged before war was declared.
7. That the vessel takes on board fuel and supplies sufficient only to carry it to its port of destination or the same quantity substantially which it has been accustomed to take for a voyage before war was declared.
8. That the cargo of the vessel consists of articles of commerce unsuited for the use of a ship of war in operations against an enemy.
9. That the vessel carries passengers who are as a whole unfitted to enter the military or naval service of the belligerent whose flag the vessel flies, or any of its allies, and particularly if the passenger list includes women and children.
10. That the speed of the ship is slow.

D. Port authorities, on the arrival in a port of the United States of an armed vessel of belligerent nationality, claiming to be a merchant vessel, should immediately investigate and report to Washington on the foregoing indications as to the intended use of the armament, in order that it may be determined whether the evidence is sufficient to remove the presumption that the vessel is and should be treated as a ship of war. Clearance will not be granted until authorized from Washington, and the master will be so informed upon arrival.

E. The conversion of a merchant vessel into a ship of war is a question of fact which is to be established by direct or circumstantial evidence of intention to use the vessel as a ship of war.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
September 19, 1914.

The foregoing was certainly much modified, and an entirely different rule announced by the note of January 18, 1916, issued by the State Department, where it is stated:

It is a matter of the deepest interest to my Government to bring to an end, if possible, the dangers of life which attend the use of submarines as at present employed in destroying enemy commerce on the high seas, since on any merchant vessel of belligerent nationality there may be citizens of the United States who have taken passage or members of the crew in the exercise of their recognized rights as neutrals. I assume your Government is equally solicitous to protect their nationals from the exceptional hazards which are presented by their passage on merchant vessels through these portions of the high seas in which under-sea craft of the enemy are operating.

While I am fully alive to the appalling loss of life among noncombatants, regardless of age or sex, which has resulted from the present method of destroying merchant vessels without removing the persons on board to places of safety, and while I view that practice as contrary to those humane principles which should control belligerents in the conduct of their naval operations, I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the invasion of commerce, since those instruments of war have proved their effectiveness in this practical branch of warfare on the high seas.

In order to bring submarine warfare within the general rules of international law and the principles of humanity without destroying their efficiency in their destruction of commerce, I believe that a formula may be found which, though it may require slight modification of the precedent generally followed by nations prior to the employment of the submarine, will appeal to the sense of justice and fairness of all the belligerents in the present war.

Your Government will understand that in seeking the formula or rule of this nature I approach it of necessity from the point of view of a neutral, but I believe that it will be equally efficacious in preserving the lives of noncombatants on merchant vessels of belligerent nationalities.

My comments on this subject are predicated on the following propositions:

First. A noncombatant has a right to traverse the high seas in a merchant vessel entitled to fly a belligerent flag, to rely upon the observance of the rules of international law and principles of humanity; and if the vessel is approached by a naval vessel of another belligerent, the merchant vessel of enemy nationality should not be attacked without being ordered to stop.

Second. An enemy merchant vessel when ordered to do so by a belligerent submarine should immediately stop.

Third. Such vessel should not be attacked after being ordered to stop unless it attempts to flee or to resist. In case it ceases to flee or resist, the attack should be discontinued.

Fourth. In the event that it is impossible to place a prize crew on board of an enemy merchant vessel or to convoy it into port, the vessel may be sunk, provided the crew and passengers have been removed to a place of safety.

In complying with the foregoing principles, which in my opinion embody the principal rule, the strict observance of which will insure the life of a noncombatant on a merchant vessel which is intercepted by a submarine, I am not unmindful of the obstacles which would be met by undersea craft as commerce destroyers.

Prior to the year 1915 belligerent operations against enemy commerce on the high seas had been conducted with cruisers carrying heavy armaments. In these conditions international law appeared to permit a merchant vessel to carry armament for defensive purposes without lessening its character as a private merchant vessel. This right seems to have been predicated on the superior defensive strength of ships of war and the limitation of armament to have been dependent on the fact that it could not be used effectively in offensive against enemy naval vessels, while it could defend the merchantmen against the generally inferior armament of piratical ships and privateers.

The use of the submarine, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

If a submarine is required to stop and search a merchant vessel on the high seas, and in case it is found that she is of an enemy character and that conditions necessitate her destruction and the removal to a place of safety of persons on board, it would not seem just nor reasonable that the submarine should be compelled, while complying with these requirements, to expose itself to almost certain destruction by the guns on board the merchant vessel.

It would therefore appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government, I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal rights which may be denied on account of new conditions.

I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration, conditioned upon their enemies making a similar declaration.

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government, and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

Independently of the note last referred to the reason for the existence of the rule that belligerent merchantmen may arm for defense has almost disappeared.

In the days of predatory and unlawful attacks by pirates and other illy disposed persons on land and sea need existed for such armament.

Upon the entire globe, until the commencement of the struggle across the sea, the situation could only with much difficulty be found where need for defensive arms was required, and certainly at no place contiguous to the theater of war.

I am willing to concede the right of such merchantmen to arm defensively, but call attention to the condition that had made such armament superfluous, as it existed prior to the commencement of hostilities abroad.

This changed condition has now made a great change in the reason of the rule governing the arming of merchantmen, and has also made the actions of such armed belligerent merchantmen subject to much closer scrutiny.

The pirate on the sea and the plunderers on the shore are rarely found to-day, except in the lurid literature that is based more on imagination than on fact.

Prior to the commencement of this war the need for such armament had all but disappeared, and armament was as rare on a merchantman as was the need existent for its use.

Only with the commencement of the war abroad was the armament renewed on merchantmen and again adopted.

It is a maxim of universal application that "when the necessity for the law ceases the law no longer exists."

However, I think that the right of belligerent merchantmen to arm for defensive purposes is sustained by the greater might of reason and can be fairly said to exist.

However, there is much force in the position taken by the Chicago Tribune in its editorial of March 2, and I here quote the same:

The structure of the submarine is and at this stage of its development must be such that the first properly directed shot is virtually certain to be the last in that only one shot, even that of a 1-pounder, is fatal to the submarine.

Put in another form, the issue is whether a merchantman armed sufficiently to destroy a submarine with one shot is defensively or offensively armed.

Under a rule formulated before the creation of the submarine the presence of a relatively small gun is held consistent with the presumption of defensive armament.

That rule was founded on the facts. A small gun could not seriously injure a warship. It could not be made offensive at the will of the commander of the merchantman summoned to surrender.

The rule does not square with the facts of the submarine. The principle upon which the rule was founded does not apply to them. A 1-pounder can destroy a submarine. The presumption that such a gun will be used only in defense must rest entirely upon the will of the commander or his instructions.

* * * * * * *

Furthermore, the presence of defensive armament on merchantmen was justified by the facts now nonexistent, namely, the practice of privateering and the existence of pirates. As pirates have disappeared from European waters and privateering is no longer permissible under the international law, no presumption of defense can attach to the presence of guns on merchantmen.

Enemy ships consist of only two kinds—combatant and noncombatant. If a ship is noncombatant, it will not be equipped to combat. If a ship is equipped sufficiently to destroy an enemy warship, as in the case of a merchantman mounting a 6-inch, 4-inch, or 1-pounder gun, such merchantmen having no use for such armament except against the enemy craft, it can not claim the character of an "unarmed" merchantman, but should be held, what in fact it is, a combat ship.

The object of any armament on a ship of the belligerents is one and one only—to use against enemy warships; to be explicit, the submarine. It is therefore an armed ship and the distinction as to the defensive and the offensive armament, founded on the practice of privateering and piracy and having no application to use against enemy warcraft, is not involved.

* * * * * * *

If American honor is involved in this controversy, it calls upon us to look the facts in the face; to apply to them principles, not a mere formula, and to adopt fearlessly the course which justice dictates.

If it is American sympathies or interests that are involved, let us not talk about honor and let us consider sensibly and candidly what those interests are.

While I am not quite able to agree that the right to arm does not belong to a merchantman, still I am impressed by the force of the editorial.

If this right exists only in a dubious manner, then it follows that the need certainly exists for the belligerent to conduct itself with the greater care to avoid the appearance and actions of a hostile vessel of war as against any craft, including an enemy submarine, for no rule of international law is better settled than that an armed merchantman can under no circumstances make an attack on a vessel without losing the protection accorded it and its peaceable capacity by the law of nations.

A word will answer the second query.

2. What is the status under the law of nations of such vessel upon the sea?

(a) It may defend itself against any attack not made by a vessel of war by any evil-disposed force either on land or sea.

(b) A submarine, legally commissioned by an enemy nation, is a vessel of war as much as a dreadnaught, a battleship, or a cruiser, and a belligerent armed merchantman can under no circumstances attack it without forfeiting the protection given armed merchantmen by the law of nations.

(c) Such armed belligerent merchantmen must not have excessive armament, munitions, or crew when its voyage or ports of departure and arrival are considered.

(d) It must submit to search by vessel of war of any enemy.

(e) It must halt upon request or command from an enemy vessel of war.

(f) It must not attempt to escape.

(g) Any attempt to escape or to make an attack upon any other vessel, except in defense from predatory attack, exposes it to attack by an enemy vessel of war without warning.

Thus it will be seen that an armed merchantman of a belligerent nation must act under the rules of international law with the greatest circumspection and caution.

It will also be seen that the justification for an attack by a war vessel upon an armed belligerent merchantman will always be a question of fact based upon the armament, crew, munitions of war, and the conduct of such merchant vessel.

In making answer to the two questions just presented there is not much difficulty, for the rules involved and which have been applied date back several hundred years—and much longer if modern instruments of war are not considered.

Since the use of gunpowder and large guns, the rules, as before announced, have been generally understood, commonly accepted, and usually followed.

It is the third question that causes the perplexity of the situation and which prompts the President's request.

3. Shall American citizens be permitted, except at their own risk, to embark upon armed belligerent merchantmen and travel within the zone of war?

If considered from the standpoint of expediency, there can only be one answer, and that answer must be in the negative.

To so journey exposes the traveler by either the attack of a hostile vessel, or by the accident of a mine, to possible destruction.

For the purpose of the argument and only for such purpose it may be admitted that it would be the technical legal right of an American citizen to so travel on such armed vessel in the zone of war.

There is no more dangerous man or one more detestable than the man who at all times, at all hazards, under all circumstances, insists upon the full technical measure of his rights without regard to the disastrous effects that it may have upon others.

Such a man is either a fool or a knave, and usually both.

He is not desirable as either an individual or a citizen.

If the American people are to go to war, it must be because of some impending danger that threatens the life or the welfare of the Nation, or to redress some grave injury to its national honor, or to draw the sword in behalf of suffering humanity.

While the cry of the alarmist or the jingoist is abroad in the land public clamor is easily aroused and the public mind easily inflamed, but never will the American people in their calmer moments consent to an effusion of blood, except for the gravest cause, and in defense of the highest and most sacred rights and principles.

In the hour of excitement when the passions are aroused, when the blood is hot, a slight cause may be magnified, but when the heat of the moment is past and the blood of our citizens is flowing upon fields of battle, and lives are going out, and the wail of the mother, the sob of the wife, and the cries of the children are heard throughout the land, and the burden of carnage falls heavily upon us all, then those who hasten this country into war by reckless action will be branded by the American people with the deep and lasting brand of Cain, and they will be scourged by the scorpions of public opinion as the faithless trustees of the peace and the safety of the Nation.

Upon an old cannon captured by our soldiers I saw an inscription that should be instructive at this hour as we contemplate this question.

The cannon bore upon its breech this phrase: "Ultimo ratio regnum," or, translated, "The last argument of kings"; and so it must be with us, that war is only possible when sacred rights have been wounded and all other measures have failed.

What can be said of the man so unpatriotic who would want to plunge this Nation into war by taking passage upon an armed merchantman of a belligerent country and traveling into the zone of war?

Shall one man, reckless and indifferent, plunge this country into carnage?

It may be said that our port officers give clearance to such vessels as being armed only for defense purposes and not being of a hostile or warlike character, but all that can be changed in the twinkling of an eye when at sea by the action of the master or captain of such ship.

The peaceful vessel can become actively hostile, and the passengers, who may have embarked with the utmost of good faith, may be put at the mercy of an intemperate and injudicious captain.

It is too dangerous a policy to be lightly undertaken, and certainly too dangerous to meet with the unqualified approval of the Congress of the United States.

It may be urged that such course is within the technical right of the citizen.

If it be so urged, I am not inclined to deny it, but we have in the past few months failed to assert many technical and a number of very substantial rights.

If there is any act of President Wilson's that is more applauded than any other, it is his claim, and the claim of his adherents, that he has kept this country at peace.

My own judgment is that no country on the face of the earth has up to this time sought any conflict with this Nation; but, notwithstanding such fact, the claim that President Wilson has saved us from war is applauded by the American people.

From Mexico we have as a Nation advised our people to withdraw, and Congress has appropriated money for the purpose of assisting them to do so.

Our citizens have been tortured, murdered, robbed, and assaulted by its citizens and soldiers, and every grievance that can be imagined has been inflicted upon them.

Our women have been raped and subjected to the vilest treatment.

Property of our citizens has been destroyed and appropriated, and our flag has been trailed in the dust and insulted, and we have borne it all, because, forsooth, we are "too proud to fight," as was proclaimed by our President.

In the strength of an appeal for protection there is no comparison between the wounded cries of outraged virtue and the noisy vociferation of the reckless adventurer in the search of "thrills" in the theater of war, or of the man mad with lust of gain who would travel there at the risk of thrusting war upon his country.

In a time like this such men place themselves beyond the proper protection of the law, and do not, if injury comes, arouse the resentment of the Nation to the extent that thousands of our sons should be offered up on the altar of their adventure.

In the war abroad we have heretofore failed, times without number, to assert our full measure of rights, and to-day our commerce upon the seas is hampered and prevented and hindered and we remain passive, so far as any hostile action is concerned.

We have not tarnished our honor by being slow to anger, or will we do so by denying to our citizens the right to place themselves in positions of danger with the approval of the Government, when as the result of such action upon their part, the country may be hastened into war, by this Nation seeking to punish those who cause such injury.

The nations engaged in this struggle have lost all sense of proportion, and reason has fled.

We will ever stand upon, and demand for the Nation, every right that is needful for a full national existence, but in the name of humanity let us not seek to create a situation which will bring war as its resultant consequence.

It is said that in the Russo-Japanese War the British Government warned its subjects not to embark upon belligerent armed merchantmen.

This statement is denied by the British Government.

I do not know if it be true.

The Swedish Government of late has taken the same course. In so doing it has not sacrificed national honor, nor will we.

The people of this land will rise as one man to punish the nation, no matter what its name may be, that inflicts any injury upon us in any vital function, and all resources and all names will be placed at the need of that hour.

But for a technical right of a citizen to invade the theater of war upon an armed merchantman demanding protection against injury while doing so, hunting a chance for trouble, seeking to precipiate a land into a deluge of blood and suffering and the horrors of war, there will be neither toleration nor patience upon the part of our Nation.

Here civilization abides to-day, here reposes that balm that must heal the wounds of the earth, when reason has asserted itself with the contending forces.

Should we enter the maelstrom of hate, of bloodshed, of savagery, or of despair in a quixotic effort to protect a reckless traveler who thrusts himself within the reach of the maddened contenders?

And this brings us to the last question, even the consideration of which must make the pulses slow as the consequence of an affirmative answer are noted.

4. If injury comes to such citizens while so traveling upon armed belligerent merchantmen, should it be regarded as a cause of war.

Only one answer is possible, and that is that it would necessarily be a cause of war.

If the Congress of the United States to-day says to the citizen that he may safely travel upon such armed ships, and he accepts the right which we so tender him, and is destroyed, can we imagine that we are poltroons enough to say that our declaration of policy was only a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal and that action was not intended?

Could we thus stultify ourselves? Could our President with honor do otherwise than diplomatically go to the verge of war?

Could Congress then refuse to act?

For one I am too good a friend of the Chief Executive of this Nation to commit him to such a course in advance of the condition arising that calls for such drastic action.

For one I do not propose in advance to deliver him into the hands of his enemies when the facts that are said to constitute the danger are wholly unknown to this Congress.

For one I do not propose to commit myself to the proposition that this Nation shall enter this war except to redress a substantial injury to the vital rights of the Nation or a distinct affront to its honor.

For one I do not propose to advise action that may possess the greatest consequences without having the facts made plain why such action is necessary or should be taken. [Loud applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, this whole fight is coming on the vote on the previous question on the adoption of the rule. That is where the fight is coming. The McLemore resolution is as dead as a door nail, if we can get it to a vote. But it is on the previous question that we must win our battle.

I went to two members of the Committee on Rules who want to beat the previous question, and I said, "Gentlemen, what will you do if you beat the previous question on the rule?" That rule proposed is absolutely fair; absolutely. There is not a gag in the whole thing. Those members told me that what they want to do is to alter the rule so as to consider this McLemore resolution in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, what does that mean? In the Committee of the Whole there is no yea-and-nay vote in order. In the Committee of the Whole there is no "previous question" in order. In the Committee of the Whole there is no motion to lay on the table in order. No wonder they want to get the resolution into the Committee of the Whole House. If you mean to stand with the President of the United States and with two ex-Presidents of the United States, and if you want to go clearly on record so that nobody can question where you stand, you will vote for the previous question on the rule. Then you will vote for the rule itself, and then you will vote to table the McLemore resolution. Yesterday the Speaker of this House decided that tabling a resolution constitutes adverse action on that resolution, so there can be no doubt whatsoever of the meaning of our action if we vote to table the McLemore resolution.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the President of the United States did the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and myself the honor—and I esteem it an honor—to confer with us at length in relation to the existing situation. Since the foundation of the Government it can be said, to the honor of this House and our predecessors, that no man similarly honored has broken the confidence of the President of the United States, and no man in this House will break it. But I beg to assure my colleagues and the country, in justice to the President of the United States, in relation to two matters, and I shall do so without violating in any way any confidence.

There have been assertions that the President's attitude and his letter to Mr. POU were dictated by desires connected with party divisions in his own party. It gives me grateful pleasure to be able to assure the House that that accusation is unfounded. [Applause.]

It has been said in some quarters that the letter to Mr. POU was dictated by a desire on the part of the President of the United States for war. Mr. Speaker, with all the solemnity that ought to rest upon all of us on this day and in this place, I declare that the furthest thought away from the mind of the President of the United States is a thought or a desire for war. [Applause.]

But because I know that the President meant every word in the letter to the gentleman from North Carolina, I desire to call the attention of the House to the purpose to be subserved by this rule. I am not surprised that no Member upon the majority side who thus far has spoken has said what the President wants. The President said in his letter to Mr. POU:

> I therefore feel justified in asking that your committee will permit me to urge an early vote upon the resolutions with regard to travel on armed merchantmen, which have recently been so much talked about, in order that there may be afforded an immediate full public discussion and action upon them and that all doubts and conjectures may be swept away and our foreign relations once more cleared of damaging misunderstandings.

In relation to that request of the President of the United States, which we ought to respect, this rule is cowardly, evasive, and treacherous. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yesterday said:

> If I came from a district where the sentiment was half pro-German and half proally, I have not much doubt that I should follow suit and execute every kind of a skirt dance rather than let the pestiferous question come to a vote. Fortunately for me, there are very few, if any, Germans in my district; so it is not difficult for me to support the President.

[Laughter.]

Oh, Mr. Speaker, in that speech the gentleman from Massachusetts did himself an injustice, and I hasten to say so to the country. The gentleman from Massachusetts is always fearless, frequently wrong, and never cowardly. [Applause.] If every man in his district believed opposite from him, he would nevertheless, on a question like this, vote in accordance with the dictates of his conscience; and he did himself an injustice when he uttered the words I have quoted and imputed an injustice to the House.

Now, what does this rule do? Why, at the expiration of four hours some Member on that side will rise and move to lay on the table a resolution which, unamended, would not receive four votes in this House. Only four hours is given for public discussion. We gave 18 hours of discussion to the Post Office appropriation bill, while we give only 4 hours to a question of peace and war. We gave 7 hours to the question of immigration, that has been discussed in this House for 40 years, and we give only 4 hours to a request of the President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, if I get the opportunity—if this House will vote down the previous question and allow us to amend this rule—I will offer a rule which would give us two things; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] knows it, because he is a good parliamentarian. It gives a vote when you come out of the Committee of the Whole House on the resolution and a vote on the motion to recommit. That is two votes—one one way and one the other.

The gentleman from Massachusetts knows that under this rule there is no such vote practicable in all probability as that on the motion to recommit. This rule cuts off a right that was given to us in the Sixty-first Congress to vote on a motion to recommit, because it says:

> The said resolution shall be considered under the general rules of the House.

Oh, if we wanted a fair vote——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BENNET. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. A minute and a half.

Mr. BENNET. I regret I can not yield. If the gentlemen wanted a fair vote, why did they not put in there the right to recommit? Why did they not give us the right to vote directly?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BENNET. I can not yield on account of lack of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BENNET. What do we do here? If you adopt this rule, it is to deny the President of the United States; but it is to give every man in this House the right to square himself with his constituents by simply getting up two sets of letters—one to be sent to those who want Americans warned off ships, and the other to those who say we ought to stick by the President, right or wrong. We are voting to ourselves, not to the President. The President asked for full public discussion and a vote on the merits. We do what was done in another body if we adopt this rule. Instead of giving that full public vote and, upon our oath and conscience, our advice to the President, we give ourselves an opportunity to square ourselves with our constituents on the situation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Rules Committee, I voted in committee for this rule, and of course I will vote for its adoption by the House. I will vote for the rule and earnestly hope that it will be adopted, because this is the only way in which this House can take a positive stand before the world on the McLemore resolution. In stating my own position in emphatic language, I do not in any way question the patriotism of those who vote differently from me. I concede to them the same love of country and devotion to American principles that I claim for myself. I feel deeply and strongly on this matter, because I believe that the honor and safety and rights of my country are now in the balance. The President of the United States has asked Congress to discuss fully in public the question at issue and then act upon it. This rule provides a full and open discussion and provides the only way possible for action by this House on a question which is to-day the one great question in every capitol of the world. It is known that the defeat of the McLemore resolution is the specific thing that the President asks for in order that he might proceed unhampered in his negotiations with foreign countries in maintaining American rights and international law. The President is the spokesman of the American people in dealing with foreign nations, and in the great crisis which now confronts this Nation I would feel myself untrue to my country and to my flag if I did not comply with his request. This is not the time for divided counsel. It is not fair to this Government that foreign nations should longer be confused as to the position of the Congress of the United States, and I intend by my vote to help wipe out all doubt on the issue. This can be effectively and permanently done by the defeat of House resolution 147, known as the McLemore resolution. I ask for the adoption of the rule and the defeat of the McLemore resolution, because such action, in my opinion, means a lasting peace for this Nation. President Wilson has kept this Nation at peace while all of the other great nations of the world are mad with war. Every true American citizen should thank God that Woodrow Wilson is our President in this great crisis. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are those among us who say that the action which we wish to take to-day means war.

In my humble opinion it is the only sure way to guarantee peace, and an honorable peace is what we all devoutly pray for. From the day the President went into the White House until this very hour his ears have been filled with the din and horrors of war, and yet through it all he has guided the destiny of this Nation in peace into the greatest prosperity in its existence. The President has proven his worth and his great desire for peace, and therefore I propose to follow him in the course he has mapped out. There can be but one leader in a great crisis such as now confronts the American people, and President Wilson has proven his ability to lead and has demonstrated safety in counsel for the maintenance of peace and the rights of his people. [Applause.] As the spokesman of our people he has taken his stand before all of the nations of the earth, and the question which each Member of this House must decide to-day is whether or not the House of Representatives will support him or desert him in the hour of need of the Republic. As for myself, acting as I believe my people would have me do, I propose to stand by him until the end and render him every aid within my power, because I believe in serving him I am serving the best interests of my country.

Under the leadership of President Wilson this Government has been truly neutral in the great conflict waging across the sea. The defeat of the McLemore resolution at this particular time is the only way this strict neutrality can be continued. In my opinion if there is one question before the American people on which there is absolute unity it is that the United States should remain neutral. This rule provides the only way in which this House can register its will in proving the neutrality of the American Republic.

The American people do not desire peace with dishonor. The rights we enjoy as a free people have been purchased with the precious blood of American soldiers in four great wars. Shall we of this Congress cowardly surrender those rights and force the American people to bow their heads in shame, or shall we rally to the support of our President in his stand for American rights and American freedom?

This is the question we must decide this very day, and I would feel recreant to my oath of office and to my duty to my country if I failed to cast my vote for this rule, and after the adoption of the rule, if I failed to record my vote for the defeat of the McLemore resolution.

Other people have talked peace, but Woodrow Wilson has made peace. The people are behind him because he is a man of action and not of empty promises. What could be asked of him that he has not already done to preserve the peace and happiness and prosperity of the Nation? I will register my vote in his support as he asks, because his work in the past shows his ability to direct safely the destiny of the Nation in the future. I believe his leadership means peace in the future, but if it means war, then all the stronger the reason he should have behind him a united Congress and a solidly united people. God pity this country when its love for ease and gold becomes so intense as to force us to surrender our rights and liberties purchased by the blood of our fathers. To-day you must choose between the request of your President and the desire of foreign emperors and kings. Let us by our vote send the message ringing around the world that the American Congress knows but one flag and but one country, and that flag shall forever be the Stars and Stripes and that country shall forever be the blessed and free United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in debate I gave my reasons for opposing the adoption of the rule that is now pending before the House. I shall not repeat those reasons to-day, for within the short time allotted to me I wish to discuss another question.

Mr. Speaker, this House should either defeat this rule, leaving the matter where it now is, in the hands of the President, or else it should defeat the previous question and permit an amendment to the rule to be offered that will give this House the opportunity to express its real convictions upon the question before it, if it is to be voted upon at all. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not, for I have not the time. If I have time later on, I will. Mr. Speaker, in the letter of the President of the United States to Mr. POU, acting chairman of the Rules Committee, he said—

> The report that there are divided counsels in Congress in regard to the foreign policy of the Government is being made industrious use of in foreign capitals. I believe that report to be false, but so long as it is anywhere credited it can not fail to do the greatest harm and expose the country to the most serious risks.

Mr. Speaker, if this House is to deal with this question at all through the adoption of a rule, the President is entitled to know whether or not there are divided counsels upon this question. That can not be determined by a tabling of the McLemore resolution. Vote down the previous question, and I assure you that instead of tabling the McLemore resolution you will have an opportunity to vote upon a resolution of simple warning to the American people, advising them to refrain from traveling upon armed ships of belligerent nationalities. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I want to emphasize this proposition, that any man who believes in that kind of a warning and who votes for the previous question is subject to the charge of being a coward. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] talked yesterday about dodging. The gentleman from Massachusetts usually is one of the bravest and most courageous men in this House, but in the attitude that he takes to-day upon this resolution the gentleman subjects himself to the charge of cowardice. [Applause.] The gentleman said that if this be considered in Committee of the Whole there will be no opportunity for the House to go upon record upon the question. If the gentleman was not such a good parliamentarian I would not refer to this now, but he must have known when he made that statement that, even though this matter should be considered in Committee of the Whole, the McLemore resolution would be pending. The Committee of the Whole may adopt any amendment that it chooses. It then comes back to the House, where there will be a record vote upon any amendment that the Committee of the Whole chooses to recommend. In addition there will be a motion to recommit, and if it is considered in Committee of the Whole there will be the fullest opportunity for the House to express its will upon this question. Let no man upon either the Democratic side or the Republican side of this House—because it is not a partisan question—feel after these votes are taken that if he votes for the previous question he will be able to say, "I was in favor of a resolution of warning, but I had no opportunity to vote for such a resolution as that."

If you vote against the previous question, and permit an amendment to the rule, I repeat again that you will have the opportunity of voting for just exactly that proposition as a substitute for the McLemore resolution; but if you vote for the previous question, and thereby cut off the opportunity of amending the resolution, if trouble comes in the future, which we all hope will not come, you will have no opportunity to say, "I would have liked to have voted to avoid this crisis if I had had an opportunity; I would have done so, but I was not afforded the opportunity." You can not say that. The responsibility is upon you. If you are not willing to commit yourselves to a declaration of war against Germany if it does not see fit to yield to the demands of the administration, the responsibility is upon you now to vote against the previous question, to permit an amendment to this rule, to permit the House to express its real convictions upon this question, so that the President of the United States may know upon what he can rely. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or who may speak hereafter on the rule may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or who may speak on this rule may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. POU. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for four minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I favor the vigorous assertion and maintenance of every right of every American citizen, and I would go to any extent to express the confidence of this House in the President in his conduct of the present negotiations with other nations. I shall vote for the previous question and for the pending rule. I desire to vote for a resolution which expresses the sentiment of this House that Americans should refrain from traveling upon armed merchant ships of belligerents. It can be obtained as well by adopting this rule as by adopting what is proposed by the minority of the House. This rule is the fairest and most liberal one ever brought into the House to give the Members an apportunity to express their convictions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The minority propose to have the McLemore resolution considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where it does not belong under the rules of the House. Under the rules of the House it should be considered in the House itself. When the question comes to lay this resolution upon the table then will come the test of where Members stand, and I apprehend that gentlemen upon that side of the House who are loud in their professions of a desire to vote to warn Americans off armed merchant ships of belligerents are preparing, in anticipation of the adoption of the motion for the previous question, to cover up their retreat by voting to lay the McLemore resolution upon the table.

The President has made this request for a vote. I would not flout such a request at this time, and I shall vote to give the opportunity he requests. But when the opportunity comes I shall vote in accordance with my fixed convictions. I shall vote against laying the McLemore resolution upon the table [applause], because I know that under this rule if that motion fails full opportunity will be given to Members of this House to go upon record upon a simple and direct resolution to warn Americans against traveling upon armed merchant ships of belligerents. Such a resolution would not deny their rights, and it would not be an admission that our Government should not assert every right to the extreme limit. I agree with those gentlemen who have expressed the opinion that this country should not hazard the risk of war because of foolhardy, reckless, or mercenary Americans who persist in jeopardizing the welfare of our country by traveling on these armed ships. [Applause.] I wish to say to Members upon this side who may agree with me in my position that I believe the Committee on Rules have fully complied with the request of the President. They have brought here a rule which gives the fullest and fairest opportunity for Members to express their opinion. It provides for definite and final action. If this particular resolution be laid upon the table, there will be no opportunity during this session of Congress or during this Congress itself to revive the question, because under the precedents to lay this resolution upon the table is a final and complete disposition of the question and precludes further action by this House upon the question during the present Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina how many speeches he has remaining?

Mr. POU. There will be three more on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish the gentleman would use two of them. I have only one more.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to-day to table the McLemore resolution, because I want to vote in defense of that flag. [Applause.] Any other vote, no matter how conscientiously given under these circumstances when our national honor is imperiled, is to vote to put a yellow streak in it. [Applause.] History will so record it. We can not evade the real issue that confronts us to-day. I shall vote to table the McLemore resolution, which is a vote against it not only to strengthen the hands of the President in his conduct of foreign relations but for a vastly greater and more vital reason—to maintain our national honor and not to yield or abridge the rights of American citizens. [Applause.]

To do otherwise, in my judgment, would be to lower the American flag; to create chaos in international affairs, and result in untold complications, humiliation, and ultimate war.

I disagree with those of our friends to-day who say that the defeat of the McLemore resolution may bring on war with Germany. I contend that it will prevent war with Germany or any other nation or nations now at war, because we shall be living up to our obligations to maintain the freedom of the seas to neutral nations and their citizens, a right that has been recognized and upheld for 200 years. Not to do this would be to violate international law and our neutrality and create conditions that will be fraught with danger to our peace. This is a Nation of peace. No one wants war; and when Congress to-day tables the McLemore resolution, it gives notice to the world that we are standing for a righteous principle and our national rights. We shall then deserve and command respect. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this is a crisis in our national history. Patriotism demands a united front. Let there be no doubt about our position. It must be clear, unmistakable, and positive. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman use?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. POU. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House on this subject most reluctantly. I do so only from a sense of duty. I would wish to have before I spoke upon the question, the real issue clearly outlined. We have had a great deal said about war coming if this resolution is adopted. We have had a great deal said about the merits, whether or not merchant ships belonging to belligerents should be armed. I want to say to you, my friends, that is aside from the issue that is presented to this House to-day. The simple question presented to us is whether or not we will attend to the business that belongs to us and allow the President to attend to his. [Applause.] Here is a negotiation progressing, a diplomatic negotiation, in regard to which there is nothing more delicate or difficult, and in the midst of it a resolution is thrust into this House, and one into the Senate, and in a measure the power of the President is hampered if not destroyed.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir. [Applause.] It gives rise to the opinion in the capitals of Europe that we are a divided House and that there is no unity of purpose or sentiment, and how is the President going to conduct successfully any negotiation? He has requested simply some expression of opinion by this House upon the question whether or not this House will interfere with the progress of his diplomatic work. By the adoption of this rule, by the adoption of the previous question, by laying resolution No. 147 on the table, we simply say to the President while these negotiations are pending: "You have a free hand to go on and exercise your best judgment in discharging your constitutional duty." [Applause.]

Not for one moment are we advocating giving warning or refraining from giving warning. Many of the sentiments echoed here to-day find a response in my soul and the approval of my judgment. But I do not to-day want to be either pro-German, pro-Austrian, or pro-English, but only an American in favor of the American Nation standing up and facing the world upon its rights. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. POU. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. GRAHAM. Remember, my friends, there is no dispute about the right of an American to travel upon an armed merchant ship belonging to a belligerent. That is not in controversy. That being true, admitted by the central powers, what else could the President of the United States do but to assert the international law on the subject and say that we wish to have that observed? I am giving no bouquets to the President of the United States; I am standing here maintaining that this House shall not interfere with the discharge of his duties, but permit him to go on unhindered and unhampered by us. The time for serious action, such as a declaration of war, or any such like business, is for us to consider when it comes, and then we can act with full freedom, but there is no war between us and either of these countries imminent to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there will be but one more speech on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the rule as reported to the House provides that, after four hours of discussion in general debate, the McLemore resolution shall be considered under the general rules of the House. If the rule be adopted in that form, a motion to lay the McLemore resolution on the table will be in order at the end of the discussion, and if the motion to lay the McLemore resolution upon the table shall prevail, all amendment or further consideration of the resolution will be shut off. It is true that the House might refuse to lay the resolution upon the table and might then amend it, but it is difficult, in the opinion of many members, for them then to vote against laying the resolution upon the table, because that appears to be a vote in favor of the resolution. Two gentlemen, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], have stated what the minority of the Committee on Rules would propose if the previous question should be defeated. How they obtain the information I do not know, but I may say that they are not in this matter in the confidence of the minority of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do not.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement was made to me——

Mr. MANN. I do not yield to either gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman ought not to make a misstatement in respect to my information.

Mr. MANN. I refuse to yield to either gentleman. If the previous question should be defeated, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who is entitled to recognition then, will offer to amend the rule, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "debate," where it last occurs, and insert the following:

"The resolution and preamble shall both be open to amendment with the following amendment considered as pending, to wit:

"'Strike out both the preamble and the resolution and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'"Resolved, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives citizens of the United States, under existing conditions and irrespective of their legal rights, ought to refrain from taking passage on armed vessels of belligerent nations, except in case of imperative necessity," and the consideration of the resolution and amendments thereto shall proceed under the five-minute rule to a final vote on passage.'"

If we are correctly informed by gentlemen on the floor, not having been informed directly by the President, either in a message or in person here, as to what he desires, the President desires our opinion on the subject of American citizens traveling on armed vessels of belligerent nations. We do not express any opinion on that subject by laying the McLemore resolution on the table [applause], unless such action shall be construed as an invitation to American citizens to travel on these armed vessels. I am not willing to extend an invitation to American citizens to travel on armed vessels when to do so may bring us into serious complications, and I would not voluntarily offer to inject my own opinion upon this subject while the President is carrying on his negotiations; but when the President seeks to know what the American people may think on the subject as expressed by their Representatives, I think it is our duty, if we are to act at all, to meet the question fairly and squarely and express the opinion such as we have; and if we believe that American citizens, under at least ordinary circumstances, ought not to render this country liable to war, we ought to say so, and leave the President in his discretion and power to take care of the future. [Applause.] We have not sought to bother or annoy the President; we have not sought to interfere with the program of the President; but the President, it is said, asks our beliefs on the subject. Let us tell him frankly and fairly that we do not desire complications which will lead to war [applause]; and the only method by which we can now proceed under these circumstances, if we are willing to meet the question fairly, is to vote down, first, the previous question. I can not conceive how it will be considered that the President is informed through a parliamentary trick, such as is proposed by the Committee on Rules, to give the House no chance to vote on the real question at issue, but only to table a resolution which the House would not agree to under any circumstances. Let us be fair enough to the President, to ourselves, to the country, to meet the issue and express the opinion which we have, and thereby endeavor to prevent war, which we all hope will not come. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to support this resolution because it is asked by Woodrow Wilson the man, great as is my admiration for the man. I do not rise to support it because it is asked by the titular leader of the political party to which I belong, anxious as I am for the continued success of that party. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support this proposition because it is asked by the President of my country [applause], who, by virtue of that position, without reference to his distinguished personal attainments, is to-day the "foremost man of all the world," and who is carrying the most tremendous responsibilities that have ever rested upon any individual as the head of a neutral nation. It may be, sir, that if I were in a different situation, so far as party affiliation is concerned, the temptation might be strong and might appeal to me with more force than I can now appreciate to endeavor to embarrass the party in power by the humiliation of its leader; but I believe, Mr. Speaker, that even if the President were one of opposite political faith and I desired to embarrass and humiliate him, I should at least try to pick upon some matter that did not involve the honor of my country. [Applause.]

Sir, the President of the United States has communicated to us in an informal manner, it is true, but quite effectively, a situation that has brought gravest embarrassment to the diplomatic branch of the Government. This situation has arisen not because of any technical or official action of the House itself but by reason of the action of individual Members with which we are familiar. Communications have been sent to the responsible authorities of foreign Governments relative to these actions and the agitations resulting therefrom, and those authorities have been brought to believe that sentiment in this country is divided upon the question of whether it shall insist upon the observation of a plain, fixed principle of international law. The President has asked that the House give expression in order that he may be able to know how further to deal with those matters of diplomacy that were the subjects of negotiation at the time the diplomatic arm of this Government was paralyzed by these agitations. The rule upon which we shall shortly vote has been brought here to enable that expression to be given.

Mr. Speaker, I advert for a moment to the merits. When this House shall adjourn after this turbulent session, Members will go across the street to the House Office Building. Should it be communicated to one of us that some person will be lying in the shrubbery along the way with the intention of taking his life, it would be the part of discretion for the Member so warned to go through the subway; but he has the right under the law to travel the usual way, and I should like to know how long a government could exist which, through any of its official authorities that might directly or remotely have to do with the enforcement of the law, indicate even by a suggestion that he should not exercise that legal right, because, forsooth, he might be damaged.

The matter of individual discretion is one thing; the matter of legal right is another. [Applause.] What strength could a government have which, through any one of its official arms, warned a citizen not to exercise a right which he has under the laws of nature and under the laws of government? We should soon have nothing but a government by mobs or by force. Suppose we admit that there is reasonableness from the standpoint of military necessity upon the side of a belligerent power proposing to engage in certain practices of submarine warfare with reference to merchant vessels armed for defensive purposes. Let us not forget that it is upon the ground of military necessity alone that that nation seeks to bottom its action. If we admit it in the case of one nation we must, of course, admit it in the case of another. If we acknowledge the right of one nation to violate those rights of neutrals that are fixed by the practices and precedents of international law, we must admit the right of any other nation to violate those principles if they choose to declare it a matter of military necessity for them so to do. If we yield to one nation in one instance, we must yield to another nation in another instance, and in the end the matter will resolve itself into a mere question of military expediency as interpreted by the different belligerent nations; and this Nation, the great neutral country of the earth, will be left helpless and hopeless in the effort to protect its citizens, either as to life or property, because we shall have gone away from the fixed, well-established, thoroughly grounded, well-understood, and agreed-upon principles of international law. [Applause.] We shall be at sea without compass or rudder. We will have no influence abroad. We will have no ground upon which to base demand or plea. We will be a hopeless derelict. Under such a condition war would be most probable—certainly more probable than it will be if we stand firmly by the fixed principles of law and say, as has been already said, "We can not accede to a suggestion simply because you believe it to be a matter of military necessity, but must stand by the practices and precedents that are fixed." [Applause.]

Returning to the rule: So far as it is concerned, it is plain and unequivocal in its terms. It gives the opportunity to do under the ordinary rules of the House that which we daily do with reference to all other propositions. It provides, plainly and simply, that we consider this proposition just as we consider all propositions of legislation in the House. Any criticism of the rule proposed is a captious criticism——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 256, nays 160, answered "present" 1, not voting 17, as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado (for) with Mr. HILLIARD (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia with Mr. EDMONDS.

Mr. ADAIR with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my vote of "yea" and vote "present." If my colleague was here, he would vote "nay."

The result of the vote was announced as above ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the rule reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 271, nays 137, answered "present" 1, not voting 25, as follows:

So the rule was adopted.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. DIES with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. SABATH (for rule) with Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (against).

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado (for rule) with Mr. HILLIARD (against).

Mr. ADAIR (for rule) with Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois (against).

Mr. CLARK of Florida (for rule) with Mr. SUTHERLAND (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia with Mr. EDMONDS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for two hours.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution reported again?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 147——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule adopted, is the resolution to be reported?

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection to the reading of the resolution, it will be again reported.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman having it read in his time.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not care to have it read in my time. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I read:

"Sir, I know of only one principle to make a nation great, to produce in this country not the form but real spirit of union, and that is to protect every citizen in the lawful pursuit of his business. He will then feel that he is backed by the Government; that its arm is his arm; and will rejoice in its increased strength and prosperity. Protection and patriotism are reciprocal. This is the road that all great nations have trod."

Just a little over 100 years ago John C. Calhoun, the most illustrious statesman that has yet graced this Hall as a Representative from my State, and who appeared at the time when this country was called upon to face one of the greatest crises that it has ever yet been called upon to face, gave utterance upon the floor of this House to the sentiments I have just quoted, when he maintained the principle that no fear, no lack of preparedness, no question of dollars and cents, should govern our action, but the one great question to which he addressed himself was that the President of the United States should maintain the rights of American citizens on the high seas without regard to results.

Coming here to-day as the unworthy follower of him who represented the State of South Carolina in that crisis, I voice the real sentiment of our people when I declare that I want peace, when I say that I believe the present occupant of the White House will maintain that peace with the same dignity and honor that have characterized all his actions in handling the negotiations on the part of his country with all other countries.

With that conviction, Mr. Speaker, feeling to-day that no condition has arisen wherein it has been demonstrated that the President has gone beyond the authority with which he has been properly vested; feeling that this resolution would merely interfere with the proper discharge of his duties; feeling that no good could be accomplished by it; and that nothing could thereby be gained to this Nation, I hope that the resolution which has been offered here will lie on the table.

There should be, sir, but one consideration moving us, one thought controlling us, and one aim, and it should be that of upholding him who occupies the great position which the President holds and of keeping in view those things which protect the national honor. The one great question ought to be, Is the President of the United States within the proper exercise of his rights in trying to maintain the position that he has taken in upholding the rights of American citizens, in upholding the protection of American business and the proper safeguards of American commerce on the high seas?

If he has transgressed this right, then may the House well reprimand and interfere with him; but until he has interfered with the right of this House, until he has gone further than it was his right and prerogative to go, then at this time every man here is bound to concede that he is absolutely within his rights. No man can say that carrying out the principles he has enunciated will suddenly involve us in war. On the contrary, the best-advised men here believe that to follow his policy will be to maintain peace. Then it seems to me, sir, that at this juncture this resolution should lie upon the table and the President of the United States should be allowed to conduct his negotiations.

But, sir, whatever the result of his conclusions and actions, I shall support him, knowing his actions will maintain the national honor. No question of fear or of expense should enter into consideration of the settlement of our international rights. Again I quote the illustrious statesman from South Carolina:

Sir, I here enter my solemn protest against this low and calculating avarice entering this Hall of legislation. Whenever it touches sovereign power the Nation is ruined. It is too short-sighted to defend itself. It is an unpromising spirit, always ready to yield a part to save the balance. It is too timid to have in itself the laws of self-preservation. It is never safe but under the shield of honor.

[Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to consume some of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from New York is not here for the moment, Mr. Speaker, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to start by putting myself on record as saying I will not vote on any matter in this House to abridge a single right of the most humble American citizen.

I want to follow that by making the statement that I believe there is not at this time a question of the national honor at stake.

I say this because to my mind the real question involved, the real impulse in the hearts of the Members of this House, and the real question in the minds of every man is not so much a question of what we shall do as to warning or not warning an American citizen to do or not to do a thing on which there might be a question as to the matter of legal right, founded upon formal international law, but it is purely and solely a matter after all, in its last analysis, of what now international law is as considered by our Nation, as considered by the President, as considered by the State Department, and as considered by the nations and powers of the world. I do not think that the written law existing among nations, as obsolete as the hieroglyphics upon the pyramids of Egypt, can be recognized by any nation as international law. I thoroughly believe there is no such a thing in existence to-day as an "armed merchantman." I say that if you arm a merchantman you have converted that merchantman into an armed cruiser, into a war cruiser, for it can then destroy a submarine; and upon that theory and belief, and that being my judgment, I say that even though this resolution may become a mixed question to some extent, even though it may or may not be a warning, if we would settle the real question a warning would not then be at all necessary.

Following it to its logical sequence, not having an opportunity, as I would like to have, to vote upon the real question, now that it has been injected into this body, of whether or not the particular status is that of a war cruiser and not a merchantman, then I say I will stand for the resolution in this question of warning citizens, because I believe it a step in the right direction and that it takes away no right of any citizen of this country to so warn him.

I have heard the objection that you would change the rules during the playing of the game; that this changes the rules during the game. But I answer, that is what Lincoln did when he signed the Emancipation Proclamation.

After Napoleon the Great had been banished to the island of Elba and came back through France, the old veterans who had surrendered but who followed him to Waterloo, while the Congress of Vienna was in session, changed the rules of the game. When the Merrimac steamed out into Hampton Roads she changed the rules of warfare, and when Ericsson's invention, the Monitor, steamed in from the north and annihilated her, she changed the rules. I am not afraid to change the rules, and I say to you gentlemen of this House that it takes more courage for America to say to the nations of the world that in these days an armed merchantman does not exist except as a figment of the imagination, but that such a craft is in fact a war cruiser, and one on which no citizen of any nation, in these times when there is no piracy to fight against, should assume for one moment to take passage than to quibble over technicalities. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, at a time like this it is fortunate for the country that there are patriots in the House who can rise above partisanship and stand for America against the world. Let me mention here a few gentlemen on the other side who are measuring up to their patriotic duty to-day—the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Foss, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. GILLETT and Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, and others.

Mr. Speaker, this is no time for divided loyalty, no time for partisan politics. [Applause.] The American Representative here to-day with divided loyalty is unworthy the name of American citizen. The party that plays partisan politics at a time like this deserves the condemnation of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am glad to note that there are Republicans over there big enough and brave enough to break away from the petty partisanship of their leader [Mr. MANN] and take their stand by the President of the United States in his controversy with the Kaiser of Germany. [Applause.] Gentleman, you can not get away from the issue here. This is a diplomatic controversy between Bernstorff and Lansing, the Kaiser and the President. [Applause.] Why, Mr. Speaker, I have seen telegrams here to-day that said to Members on this floor, you can serve Germany best—putting Germany first—and the people of the United States by voting for the McLemore resolution. Ah, gentlemen, this is not the time for partisan politics. This is the time when every liberty-loving and self-respecting American citizen should put his country first. [Applause.] Where does the South stand—God bless her! In this hour when a foreign propaganda stalks through this Capitol seeking to embarrass and discredit the chosen head of our Government, where stands Tennessee, the home of Gen. Jackson, who conquered the flower of the British Army at New Orleans? What will be the answer of the Old North State, with Kings Mountain standing there as an everlasting monument to her patriotism and courage? What says the Old Dominion, the State of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, who laid the foundations of the Republic? Where stands Kentucky, the home of Beck and Clay, and the birthplace of Lincoln and Davis, the two leaders of the conflict that resulted in cementing the sections in the bonds of an everlasting Union? [Applause.] Where in this critical hour stands the splendid old Commonwealth of South Carolina, the home of Calhoun and Hayne? Where will Mississippi be found, the home of Prentiss, George, Lamar, and John Sharp Williams? [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. She will stand by the President. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I know where she will stand. What says Alabama, the home of Admiral Semmes, William L. Yancey, and John T. Morgan. On her soil, Mr. Speaker, stood the first capital of the Confederacy, and here she stands to-day in the glorious sisterhood, loyally supporting the President of the United States. [Applause.] Louisiana, Florida, and all the States in the South will join hands with the patriotic Representatives in other sections and show to the world an undivided country standing solidly behind the great President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, in Germany the issue was, Will we stand by the Kaiser? In England the issue was, Will we stand by the King? In Russia the issue was, Will we stand by the Czar, the little Vicar of God? If war comes, we will all stand by the President of the United States. [Applause.] But this, thank God, is a representative Government. [Applause.] And I wish to say to the insinuating gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] the question now is, Will you stand by the American people? [Applause on the Republican side.] You can not dodge the question, gentlemen of the Southland and gentlemen of the Northland. The question is, Will you go to war on what Mr. Lansing says is a doubtful legal right? [Applause.] I am willing to go to war if necessary. My people have borne their part. My father and my uncles fought to preserve that flag. But I say to you, the private citizens of this country, the men who pay the taxes, the men who, if there is war, will die in the trenches, the men who will breathe the asphyxiating gas, the mothers of the boys whose flesh and blood will be spattered on the fields of battle, want to know before war is declared why they have to go to war. [Applause.]

I have stood by the President of the United States. I have stood by him in his efforts to carry out the mandate of the American people. He has said that if an American citizen on board an armed merchant ship is drowned by a German submarine without warning, he will hold Germany to strict account. Stripped of its diplomatic language it means that if an American life is lost as the result of the sinking of an armed merchant ship without warning—it means war. I am willing to go to war for an American right, but not for a "doubtful legal right," as Mr. Lansing says this is. [Applause.] I am willing to go to war for an American right, but it must be a vital right. [Applause.] Our people had rights down in Mexico. They were valuable rights. They were definite, specific, and certain, based upon treaty obligations. Oh, I know there was no responsible Government down there to call to account for the violation of those rights, but nevertheless we could have sent our Army to maintain those rights. [Applause.] But I believe the President did right when he said, in behalf of the lives and the welfare of the mass of American citizens, "We will not sacrifice the lives of our American boys for the sake of a few Americans in Mexico," and warned those Americans in Mexico to come home. Now, if it is right to warn Americans in Mexico to come home, who have certain definite and established rights there, in the name of God, why am I a traitor and a coward when I stand in the halls where Henry Clay stood and say, "You shall not hurl the miners and the farmers of my district into this hell of war; you shall not take the sons from the mothers of my district and sacrifice them at Verdun or in the trenches of Europe in order to maintain a doubtful right." [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, it seems a pity to disillusionize the gentleman who has just spoken and who cries out about the danger of war. There is no danger of war in the proposition which the House is considering. The House is confronted to-day by a condition of its own making, and the appropriate committees of this House have undertaken to offer a plan by which that condition may best be remedied.

What was the condition? By the action of this House, through agitation and the introduction of a resolution, the impression has gone abroad among the people of our own country and has spread to the capitals of foreign countries that there is a schism, a division, between the legislative body and the Executive of our country. It is useless to discuss how that impression has been created, but no sane man doubts that it exists. It ought not to exist.

What harm has it done? It has embarrassed the President in the exercise of his constitutional authority in initiating diplomatic negotiations with a foreign power upon a question in which the rights of American citizens are involved. Not only that, but it has stiffened the attitude of the country with which our President was negotiating; it has given the central powers encouragement, and it has palsied the hand of the Executive. If there are hyphenated citizens in the United States—of which I hope none exists—they have derived hope and encouragement from this unhappy condition.

Mr. Speaker, in effect this condition has enabled a foreign embassy in an international negotiation to appeal from the President, whose duty it was to conduct that negotiation, to the Congress of the United States. How shall that appeal be answered? We, as Representatives of the American people, have presented to us the clear-cut issue.

Gentlemen say this involves danger of war. Danger from whom? "At the hands of the President," they say. Forsooth, the hands of the President, who during these two years has been bearing weight and responsibility such as have been borne by few of our Presidents, and who has received criticism from those who have contended that he was not sufficiently rigid in maintaining our rights, that he has not sent armed forces into a neighboring Republic, and that the rights of American citizens on the high seas have not been maintained.

There may be gentlemen in this House who believe in peace, and I am one of them. For that matter, I believe the entire membership of the Congress ardently desires the maintenance of peace, but no one believes in it stronger or will more strenuously strive to preserve peace than the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it has been repeatedly asserted on the Democratic side of this House that the great issue of to-day is whether we shall support the President of the United States or not. It suggests itself to me that a false issue is being discussed. The question is not whether we shall support the President of the United States but whether in our votes to-day and in our voices in debate we shall represent the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

For weeks I have been flooded with telegrams and letters. When I found that I was getting 10 telegrams and 10 letters in favor of warning American citizens to keep off armed ships to 1 that proposed to support the President of the United States I began an investigation to see if this was the experience of other Congressmen. I made a trip through the House Office Building and talked with Members, and also with Members on this floor. I found that 9 out of 10 had exactly the same experience that I had. [Applause.] And I say to you—and you know—that the people of the United States are overwhelmingly in favor of the principle embodied in the McLemore resolution. [Applause.]

If this be true, the question is not whether we shall support the President sentimentally or officially; it is a question whether we as honest, loyal American Representatives shall by our votes inform the President of what the people of the Republic think and what they want him to do. [Applause.] If the people desire that Americans be warned to keep off armed merchantmen, it is not for the President to desire something else. If the people desire a certain thing, it is not for you to betray your trust by saying that you will ignore their wishes in order to please the President.

I agree that this is no partisan question. Mr. Wilson is not the President of the Democratic Party. He is President of the entire American people. He is our President and should receive our sympathy and support, regardless of political affiliations, when we can conscientiously give them. But it ought not to be forgotten that Mr. Wilson is only the President. He is not the people, and his request is not equal to their mandate.

If the flood of messages contained in letters and telegrams tell you that the people are in favor of the passage of the McLemore resolution, it is your duty to pass it, regardless of what the President of the United States desires or thinks. And if you yield to the power of presidential blandishments, when you know that his views and wishes are not in harmony with the predominant sentiment of the people of the Republic, you have violated a sacred trust and have shown yourselves to be unworthy Representatives of a great Nation.

If Mr. Wilson can dominate the Congress by a mere request which the sentiment of the people disapproves, and if Congress is cowardly and obsequious enough to be thus dominated by the President, true representative government is at an end. If a single man, however great his talent, righteous his motives, or high his place, can set aside the collective judgment of the people, then this is no longer "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is a benevolent despotism, a monarchy veiled under republican forms.

The mock heroism, the false chivalry of this hour, and of the request of the President are a disgusting exhibition in the American Congress. The Teutonic powers are fighting odds of five to one. Their fleet is bottled up. In case of war with them, it would be impossible for us to reach them or for them to reach us. And yet the President wishes to give an exhibition of national courage in making academic demands upon Germany and her allies. How much better it would look, how much more appropriate the exhibition if he would instruct the Secretary of State to serve notice upon England that he would hold her to a strict accountability for her repeated violations of international law resulting in damage to American commerce and in insult to and outrage upon the rights and privileges of American citizens. England is free and able to fight us. The world would applaud our courage and admire and trust our sincerity, if we were to seriously throw down the gantlet to a foemen worthy of our steel. The world will have only contempt for us when we indulge in the bravado and farce of a mimic war upon Germany, whose army and whose fleet could never reach us.

This Congress should by resolution, if need be, request the President of the United States to tell us why England treats us with the contempt of ignoring completely our notes of ministerial protest, and why she refuses absolutely to give any satisfaction for insults to our citizens, destruction of our commerce, and outrages upon the international mail service. Brave men throughout the world will distrust our sincerity and condemn our cowardice as long as we let England escape and attempt to hold Germany to a strict accountability.

I hold no brief for the German people. I am not pro-German, nor am I pro-ally. I am pro-American, but I do insist that a square deal for all is the only fair test and sure indication of sincere neutrality. Let us make Germany toe the mark if she violates our rights, but let us likewise serve notice upon England that in dealing with her an even-handed justice shall hold the scales. But in no case let us plunge the country into a bloody war upon a mere technicality, upon a plain academic question. Having received more than 500 letters and telegrams urging me to support the resolution and fewer than 50 asking me to support the President, I believed that I was reflecting in my vote the overwhelming sentiment of the people of my district. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Objects to what?

Mr. MANN. To all requests for extension; let the truth be told.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that this resolution is before the House, and I want it known, so far as I am concerned, that it is not here because of the desire or request of Congress. Had there not been a demand on the part of the President the resolution would still be slumbering in the proper committee. I resent the assertion made upon this floor that by bringing this resolution out Congress is seeking to interfere with the prerogatives of the President of the United States. This resolution is before this body at the instance and at the requset of the President himself. I am frank to say, Mr. Speaker, that I will not support the resolution. It is not expressive of the principle I have in mind. The only reason I will have for voting against tabling it, as I shall vote, will be the statement made upon the floor of this House to the effect that if the motion to table it does not prevail the pending resolution will be subject to amendment. The amendment to be offered was read by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], which amendment is not obnoxious to any principle of international law. [Applause.] It recognizes instead of denying the right of American citizens to travel upon armed merchant ships of the belligerent powers, but it suggests to them that patriotic conduct being their impulse they should refrain from the exercise of that right except in cases of most urgent necessity. It is with the idea of answering the Pfesident's question as to the sentiment of this House that I shall vote against the tabling of the McLemore resolution that I may get an opportunity to vote upon a resolution that is expressive of my sentiments. [Applause.] Under the rules of the House this opportunity will be denied me if the resolution is tabled. I have heard a great deal of talk about standing by the President.

Mr. Speaker, I am thinking, as the time approaches for me to vote upon this proposition, of the carnage over there at Verdun. I am thinking of 3,000,000 boys less than 17 years of age in the trenches on the western front. I am thinking of the hills and the plains of that locality that yesterday were white with snow, the color scheme of which to-day has been changed to red. I am thinking, Mr. Speaker, of the foreign mother who kneels by the empty pillow where lay her little lad before he became a soldier. I am thinking of the mothers of Europe who in the lonely solitude of their homes to-day are listening for the music of a voice that is silent, for the sound of steps that are still. I am thinking not of the President of the United States, but I am thinking of the quiet places out yonder in America. I am thinking of the homes and the firesides from which the President has expressed the desire to hear. I am thinking of the youth whom we are training for the duties of citizenship. Europe is killing hers; we are equipping ours. [Applause.] And I say to you that for no doubtful international right will I sacrifice the lives of the Nation's youth. [Applause.] I will not go to the homes and the firesides of this Nation and deny the right to live to the boys of my country. I will not put grief, anguish, and despair in the homes of America and compel the parents of the land to stand by the graves of buried hopes in order that some man, some irresponsible, crazy man, shall have the right to travel upon the armed ships of belligerent nations when neutral vessels leave our ports every day. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I have heard a great deal said for and against the McLemore resolution. It seems to have been discussed from every angle of approach. There are those who contend that Americans should be warned against traveling on armed merchantmen. They contend that it is the duty of Congress to say to our people that it is dangerous, and this resolution even goes so far as to repudiate responsibility should they travel on such armed vessels.

If it were only a question of warning our people, Mr. Speaker, then it would be a very simple matter, because each and every one of us here desires that the traveling public and those who are compelled to cross the waters should be warned against danger by reason of the war now raging in Europe. If it were possible for Congress to do this without relinquishing any rights of the American people, without changing the rules of international law which has protected neutrals for lo these many years, then Congress would not only feel it its duty but its desire to give such warning.

The fact, however, is different. To pass a resolution of this nature is but yielding a point for which the President has been contending almost since the beginning of the war. We can not compel nor persuade nations to disarm their merchant ships. We have tried that. They have the right to so arm for defense under the interpretation of international law. Chief Justice Marshall, in rendering the celebrated opinion in the Nereide case (9 Cranch), laid it down as law that merchantmen had the right to arm for defense. We have contended for that decision as the true interpretation, and to waive it by the passage of such a resolution as this, which not alone warns but which repudiates responsibility if they do so travel, we would render null and void the effect of this decision and likewise the principle of international law for which the President has been contending. We would thwart him in this matter and weaken him for future efforts by reason of a division in our Government.

Nowhere in the history of nations can there be found a precedent for a resolution of this nature. The research bureau of the Congressional Library has tried in vain, and none can be found. Shall we, the great American Republic, the only powerful neutral Nation to whom the world can look for strength and support in maintaining the rights of neutrals by the proper interpretation of international law, be the one to show the white feather by yielding to the dictates of any foreign power? [Applause.]

I realize there are many who claim that modern conditions are different; that the invention of the submarine has made a different interpretation of international law essential, by reason of the fact that the submarines are so fragile that they can be pierced at long range by 4 or 6 inch guns carried by merchantmen; and that, therefore, to allow merchantmen to be armed for defense is dangerous to submarine warfare.

Others contend that the necessity for merchant ships carrying arms has long since passed away, because the former reason for this defense—that of pirates—no longer exists, and, therefore, there is no necessity of their being armed for that purpose.

Others tell us that if we stand for this principle we may be sorry for it some day, because we may wish to use submarines in defense of our shores in wars which may come upon us in future years.

These contentions have great weight among many people of our country. They do not look for nor are they sufficiently familiar with the facts to see what we would be yielding if we gave up the great principle for which we are contending. The President has stood firmly for the proper enforcement of international law. He contends that before any merchantman carrying arms merely for defense is molested those on board should have warning from the submarine in order that they may be able to escape destruction.

If we yield this right, then we leave the seas open for submarine warfare under all conditions, and it would become a matter of proof after the destruction had taken place and many American lives perhaps destroyed. It seems to me that the President is not asking too much when he asks the foreign Governments to instruct those in charge of the submarines to give warning to vessels armed merely for defense and who are in no wise on the offensive.

The Constitution of our country has imposed certain duties upon its three branches of Government. That imposed upon the President is executive and the right to negotiate treaties; by long usage and custom the President has had charge of the diplomatic relations of our country. Congress has allowed him free rein in these matters, until the time comes when his authority is exhausted and he submits to Congress the facts and circumstances for their consideration. The President of the United States has been successful in carrying on the diplomatic relations with foreign Governments since the beginning of the War. He has managed to keep us out of entanglements and war. The country has become prosperous and our people are enjoying the great comforts of peace. There is no reason to believe that the President will not succeed in the future as he has in the past and the peace of the country be maintained.

I feel that Congress should accord him a strong vote of confidence in this matter; that we should stand behind him as a united Congress and a united people; that the world may know that the department of the Government charged with the negotiation of foreign matters is backed up by that part of the Government having in charge the legislative functions under the Constitution.

It is no longer a question as to whether we shall pass the McLemore resolution warning the people not to travel on armed merchantmen, and repudiating our responsibilities if they do, but the question has become a greater one—whether or not we will stand by the President or whether we will tie the hands of the Executive not only in this but in future negotiations.

If Congress should step in and grab the reins, with a membership of over 500, nothing but confusion would result. There could be no definite policy because of so many and varied views; in fact, our whole diplomatic relations would be so upset and so subject to change that no country would feel like respecting them nor would they know what to expect because of the confusion.

I have supported the President, Mr. Speaker, from the very beginning of this controversy, not alone because I am against such a preposterous resolution as the McLemore resolution but because I believe the peace, prosperity, and the future welfare of this Nation depends upon the continued confidence in our Chief Executive and in leaving to him the management of those matters which the Constitution and usage have imposed upon him.

I have heard much said about war in the event this resolution was not passed, but I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we would continue peace we must have a settled policy, as we have had, and that the man who has brought us safely through thus far can confidently be relied upon to carry us to the end without war and without trouble with foreign nations.

I have constituents in my district who are descended from the people of all the great Governments of Europe. I feel that they have every confidence in the Executive who now occupies the White House. There is no better district in this broad land than the one which I have the honor to represent. While the people are derived from all the nations of Europe, they are Americans first; they are not the enemies of any particular nation, but they believe that every nation should respect our flag and those republican principles and precepts for which we stand. Having such a constituency, who understand the question before us and want the President sustained, I sincerely hope that Congress may stand united behind the Executive in the onerous work in which he is engaged.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, on account of the condition of my throat.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that this is one of the most critical and most momentous times in the history of the affairs of this Nation. I frankly confess to you that I was never more serious in my life than I am at this moment. For several days I have been worried over the disposition to be made of this resolution by this House. It is a time for mutual candor and counsel, and the action taken by this House at this time should be so clear, definite, and certain as not to be susceptible to criticism or be left to conjecture. We should settle the question right or not attempt to settle it.

Sometime ago the President suggested that Congress keep its hands off while he was carrying on his negotiations with the great powers now at war. In that suggestion I think he was exactly right. I think he should have a free hand, and it is the duty of each and every Member of this House to stand by him in his diplomatic negotiations with foreign belligerent countries. So far as I am personally concerned, I assure you that I shall stand by the President on that question if I am given the right to do so in a direct and positive manner, but I do not believe in the farcical method of indorsing him by tabling this resolution. To support this motion to table the resolution means nothing.

The President in his recent letter to Representative POU insists that the House take definite action in relation to his right to carry on diplomatic negotiations. He seems to want a definite expression on the part of this House. To express ourselves ambiguously, inferentially, or indefinitely would render him no support, for it leaves the question as to whether or not Congress is backing the President open to further discussion and conjecture and subject to various constructions, inconsistent with our real attitude, and leaves the matter open to dispute. He certainly does not want an indorsement of his diplomatic policy by having this resolution tabled, and for this House to table it at this time would be to evade and side-step the questions involved in this resolution, and such action on the part of this House would be of necessity unsatisfactory to the President and to the country as well. The eyes of the world are fastened and glued upon this House at this time, and the people of this Nation are expecting a clean-cut and candid expression on the part of its representatives in Congress with reference to the questions raised by this resolution. The President surely does not want a half-hearted and lukewarm indorsement. He wants an honest and decisive indorsement.

I want it clearly understood that I am with the President on his constitutional right, as I see it, to conduct the diplomatic negotiations of this Nation according to his best judgment and in such a manner as best subserves and protects this Nation, but I want to express my loyalty to him in a clear, concise, and definite way. I can not do this by voting to table this resolution. I would be untrue to my convictions and disloyal to the people whom I have the honor and pleasure to represent if I should evade what I believe to be my plain duty.

This resolution is so worded as not to be entirely clear. In the main the question raised by it is whether or not Americans should be warned to stay off of armed belligerent merchantmen or armed belligerent ships. It carries with it a sort of a blanket indorsement of the President's diplomatic policy. The real object of the motion to table the resolution is to give an indirect indorsement of the President on his diplomatic policy and to directly refuse to warn Americans to stay off of armed belligerent merchantmen and armed belligerent ships.

The questions raised in this resolution should have been presented separately and in clear, definite, and certain language so that this House could have had the opportunity to meet the two questions fairly and squarely and to express their views upon them, independently of each other.

The motion to table the resolution is a political ruse. This is no time for politics. There is no politics in this question, and it should not be injected into it in this manner. This is a question of patriotism and of an expression of true, loyal American citizenship, and should receive the most candid and most serious consideration, without regard to political affiliation. It is no time for foolishness. It is a time when we should be serious and honest and true to ourselves and to our country. We can not express our loyalty and patriotism to this great country by voting to table this resolution; and that is exactly what the adoption of this rule means.

I am not at all satisfied with the course taken by the Senate with relation to the Gore resolution. I think that the question that was presented to the Senate called for more definite, rational, and courageous action on the part of the Senate. In my judgment the Senate of the United States has, in a manner not creditable to it, relinquished its constitutional authority to be heard concerning questions that affect the peace and welfare of this country. I do not mean to say this discourteously or offensively, but I can not refrain from expressing my opinion that the manner in which this great question was disposed of is not consistent with the dignity and the courage which should characterize public action on the part of the Senate of the United States.

It is now generally understood that even the Senators themselves were not sure as to what the action taken by them really meant or how it would be considered by the public and the world. The matter is still being agitated by the Senate, the people, and the press of this country, and will continue to be agitated by the Senate until the questions involved in the Gore resolution shall have been decided positively. The press of the country is not sure of the meaning of the action of the Senate, and if this House should vote to table this resolution, the same uncertainty will prevail throughout the country, and this matter will have been left practically undecided, and open to discussion and to various constructions inconsistent with decisiveness. We can not dodge this question. The minds of the American people can not be befogged by the indefinite and uncertain action of Congress on this matter.

I take the privilege of quoting, in part, a speech delivered by Mr. CLARKE, a stalwart Democrat of Arkansas, on the floor of the Senate last Friday, in which he said:

> There is no overlooking the fact that all our public acts and declarations have led in a certain direction and have created a distinct impression that official America, at least, is anxiously interested in the success of one of the parties to this great conflict. It will not require any inspired ingenuity to guess which one, because it has almost become a saying that anybody who at this day professes to be neutral must be in sympathy with the Germans, since everybody else occupying an official position seems to have taken his stand on the other side of the controversy. Now, I do not indorse that view; I do not believe that it correctly represents the true spirit of America; I do not believe that it correctly represents the Congress of the United States. I believe that the interests, the history, and the traditions of this Government commit it to a policy of entire fairness and absolute neutrality, and that this attitude should be reflected by those who assume to speak by authority when they represent this country in connection with this great struggle.

If existing international law and rules seem, by virtue of their attempted adaptation to existing facts, to favor one of the belligerent parties there can be no good reason why we should not make the further inquiry as to whether or not we are compelled to persist in a course that puts us in an attitude of distinct unfairness to the other.

I have thought all along, and I believe now, that the Congress of the United States ought to supplement some existing international rules and regulations with further declarations, which it has ample and undisputed authority to make. No code of laws at this period of the world's history is complete; otherwise there would be no excuse for this Congress and like assemblies remaining in perpetual session. Defects are discovered all the time. Principles are becoming obsolete by reason of the progress of the world in connection with mechanical and industrial arts and sciences. Rules of action applicable to conditions of facts with which we were called upon to deal yesterday will become obsolete to-morrow. New laws will be necessary to meet new conditions.

It is hardly necessary for me to comment upon the fact that Senator CLARKE is one of the most distinguished and capable men of the country. He is a great lawyer, and his advice and counsel are sought by men who are high up in the counsels of the affairs of the Nation. He is at present President pro tempore of the Senate.

Senator CLARKE is not alone in his conclusions. He is supported by Senator CUMMINS of Iowa, Senator HITCHCOCK of Nebraska, Senator CLAPP of Minnesota, Senator JONES of Washington, Senator MCCUMBER of North Dakota, and quite a few other Senators.

SHOULD AMERICANS BE WARNED?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have made myself clear, at least I hope I have, that I favor the unanimous support by this House of the President, with reference to the consideration of diplomatic affairs with other nations. However, I can not agree with the President that Americans should not be warned to stay off of armed belligerent ships. In my judgment, this warning should be given to each and every American citizen, for in this way we may prevent this country from being dragged into the war. This warning to Americans can in no way embarrass, hinder, or disturb the President in his diplomatic negotiations. He is the head of the Diplomatic Service, and if American citizens should be warned to keep off of armed belligerent merchantmen or armed belligerent ships, the President might be saved a most glaring embarrassment in the future. This Nation should not be dragged into war by heedless, foolhardy, and reckless conduct on the part of an American citizen who may take passage on an armed belligerent merchantman or an armed belligerent ship and lose his life. If he should be permitted to take such passage upon an armed belligerent merchantman and lose his life, this Nation of necessity would most certainly be immediately forced to cut off all diplomatic relations with the country whose submarine caused the loss of the life of such an American citizen, and this action on the part of this Government, in my judgment, would finally and most certainly drag us into war with that country. Therefore it seems to me the part of wisdom and of precaution that Americans should be warned not to take passage upon any armed belligerent merchant ship. I feel that it is the sincere and absolute duty of Congress to give this warning, and I have not been able to see wherein or whereby such warning would in any manner embarrass, hinder, or disturb the President of the United States in his diplomatic negotiations. It would not prevent the President from standing firmly for his principles. It does not take from him the right to stand for the principles which he maintains. Wherein could it do harm? It would not be yielding a point or making a concession. It is not even a tentative concession. It is a precautionary measure intended to protect and preserve American citizens and relieve this Nation of embarrassment that would eventually result in war to this country.

So far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of war. I believe in the theory that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and I am sure the American people do not want war; and if I am right in this conclusion, then why not do everything within our power to prevent international entanglements?

I want it distinctly understood, however, that I am not for peace at any price. I believe in upholding the honor and dignity of this Nation, and if there comes a time in the history of affairs when the honor and dignity of the Nation has been disregarded by any foreign nation in the world I believe it to be the duty of Americans to defend that honor and dignity. However, I do not see just how a warning to American citizens to stay off of armed belligerent merchantmen could reflect upon the honor and dignity of this Nation or in anywise jeopardize it.

The American people do not want war; they want peace; and every American citizen who reads and acquaints himself with the facts disseminated through the public press knows that it is unsafe to take passage upon any armed belligerent ship or upon any vessel of any one of the nations at war. We should keep in mind and remember that there are at least four first-class neutral lines in operation between this country and Europe—our own American line, the Holland-American line, and two Scandinavian lines. At least some of those do not carry ammunition, while practically all, if not absolutely all of the belligerent ships carry cargoes consisting chiefly or largely of ammunition. If we were in war we would regard enemy ships carrying ammunition to be used against our soldiers as floating arsenals, and we would destroy them if we could, no difference who was on them; and if these floating arsenals were armed we would unhesitatingly class them as auxiliary naval vessels.

THE DUTY OF AMERICANS.

Now, as to the duty of Americans. With the knowledge that war exists between certain nations in Europe, it is their duty to keep off of ships flying flags of any of these nations at war. Why? Because they know that the flag represents nationalism, and when one nation is at war with another that flag invites attack, and the ship's destruction or seizure, especially when carrying contraband of war; and especially do they know, when any ship carries a cannon, manned by naval representatives of any warring nation, that that cannon is there for warfare, for offense or defense, as occasion calls. Under such a state of affairs, as good Americans they should avoid danger, they should keep out of the line of fight. They are false to themselves and to their country when they jeopardize the peace of their fellowmen.

They all have knowledge of the fact that a fearful war is ravaging Europe. Powerful nations, jealous of their rights on the sea and of their commercial and naval expansion, have plunged almost all Europe into war.

MEXICAN POLICY.

During the great conflict in Mexico Americans were warned not to go into Mexico, because by so doing they might drag this Nation into war with that country, and they were further told that if they did go into Mexico that they went at their own risk and peril. The personal and property rights of American citizens living in Mexico have not been protected by this Nation as they should have been. Many Americans have been slaughtered by the warring forces in that country, and many of them have suffered great loss of property. All of which has been brought to the knowledge of the present administration and to the knowledge of Congress and the people of this country, and yet we have kept quiet. We have refrained from war. We have accepted the fate of the Americans and the loss of their property without making very much fuss about it. I do feel that Americans and American rights should be protected anywhere in the world, but at the same time I do not feel that any one American citizen should jeopardize the peace of his country.

Nearly 50,000 Americans lawfully and peacefully living in Mexico were warned by this administration to abandon their rights and were compelled to leave their homes and property because their Government refused to afford them protection. Many Americans wearing the uniform of their own country were killed. Some of them were killed on our own soil.

The President claims that he is contending for a great principle. If his contention is good now, why should it not have been good as to Mexico? It seems to me that this principle could be maintained by adhering strictly to the principles of neutrality and by taking every reasonable precaution to avoid international entanglement. If we maintain a strict neutrality, we will keep our people out of war. We should be cool, cautious, conservative, and reasonable, and this does not mean that we can not be true, loyal, brave, patriotic American citizens.

The people of the congressional district whom I have the honor to represent expect me to take a decided stand in all matters of legislation, and if I should vote to table this resolution I feel that I would simply be straddling, dodging, and sidestepping the questions involved in the resolution, and that I do not propose to do. I will do my duty under my oath, as I see it, unhesitatingly and fearlessly. I have no faith in a straddler, a dodger, or a side-stepper. I am either for a thing or I am against it. No honest man could be otherwise; and, consequently, I am compelled by reason of the facts and statements hereinbefore made to vote "no" on the question of tabling this resolution. If I was permitted to vote on an amended resolution, I would vote "yes," but I am denied that privilege. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am in favor of warning American people to stay off belligerent ships that are armed for defense. I do not believe that any citizen of the United States has the moral right to menace the safety and liberty of the United States by taking passage upon a vessel that is liable to be destroyed by submarines without notice. I am not afraid of the sane man's conduct bringing the country into a crisis of that character, but it is the man who has no regard for the rights and liberties of his countrymen of whom I am afraid.

And I say when the question of warning can be squarely presented to the House not associated with any diplomatic problem, I shall vote in favor of it. But that is not the proposition here. My friends, the question presented in this controversy is whether we shall stand by the President in this crisis or not. That is the issue for us to settle, and not whether we want war or whether we do not want war. Gentlemen affirm their patriotism and say that they are in favor of supporting the President not only in the negotiations on diplomatic affairs but in all interests wherever we come in contact with a foreign country. That is not disputed; but what we want to do, gentlemen, is to inform the courts of Europe that you stand by the President, and not inform us. That is the proposition before the House now.

Now, what do we propose to do in our report? The Committee on Foreign Affairs in its report as presented recognizes in the President his exceptional right, or his right established by precedent and practice, to negotiate all diplomatic relations between this country and any other country. We also propose in that report to recognize the rights of Congress as provided in the Constitution and by the precedents and practices established under it. And we state in our report also this other fact, that when the President has reached a period when he can no longer proceed with the diplomatic relationship which we sustain, he shall bring his correspondence to Congress, and then we will take such action as in the premises seems necessary. We will do in this instance just as Mr. Cleveland did in the Venezuela affair. After he had exhausted all his efforts in settling that proposition, he came to Congress and laid all the facts and communications and conditions before it, and Congress acted promptly. Not only in that instance but in all other instances in which the Congress of the United States has been involved it acted unanimously and patriotically in favor of the Chief Executive of the country.

What is the condition? Since September 3, 1914, there have been swept into the great vortex of European war more than two-thirds of the Caucasian race. Every Government of western Europe is participating in the contest now on, and it became the duty of this country to become a conservator of those principles of international law upon which rests the civilization, the prosperity, and the justice of every nation. Let every Member of this House abjure partisanship and be brave enough and patriotic enough to reinforce the President by his vote to continue a condition of peace which he has maintained for 18 months. New and most perplexing problems, intricate and far-reaching in character, have engaged the attention of the Chief Executive. I will not cast my vote to give aid and comfort to any foreign country that we are divided in our support of the President of the Republic. When a problem of international diplomacy is involved every aid and assistance should be American and the peace and happiness of our people our aim. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, there is one thing in this discussion that must have been impressed upon the minds of all. Almost without exception every speaker who has been before you to-day has said that he believed the American people should be warned to keep off of armed merchant ships of belligerents, and yet about half of them in the next breath have said, "Stand by the President." How can we stand by the President better than by giving him an honest opinion in this House on that very question of warning American citizens to keep off armed merchantmen? [Applause.] And yet we all know the cards have been so shuffled and dealt that this House will have no opportunity whatever to give to the President that which he has asked of us, to wit, our opinion as to warning Americans to keep out of the danger zone.

Why, we are told that we will give up the inalienable right of American citizens to travel wherever they will, upon any means of conveyance they choose, if we say to them in this time of peril and great crisis, "You must not go into the danger zone expecting the protection of your Government behind you."

Last summer I had an experience that in a measure, it seems to me, is on all fours with the present international complication. I had occasion to travel from the State of Massachusetts, through New Hampshire, into the State of Maine. Now, the Constitution of the United States gives me an inalienable right to travel at will upon the highways of all the States in this country. And yet on a highway in New Hampshire I saw a sign on a fence across that highway saying to me, "Detour. This road is passable, but dangerous. If you go on it it is at your peril."

I wonder if any Member of this House would think his inalienable right of citizenship had been abridged in the slightest by the action of the authorities in New Hampshire? I wonder if any sensible American would for a moment have thought of calling upon the Federal Government to compel New Hampshire to guarantee his safety if he exercised his inalienable right and traveled over that road, which he was told was dangerous? I did not feel that my rights of citizenship has been abridged or taken from me. Rather, I was thankful that the State had warned me that danger lay ahead and had pointed out to me how I could avoid it.

Gentlemen to-day have told what their constituents think of this question of warning Americans. I have been receiving letters for months past from constituents in my district asking me why the President did not notify American citizens to keep off armed ships, and others said, "Why does not this Government compel Americans to keep off these armed merchantmen and not imperil the peace of this great country of 100,000,000 people?" It seems to me, my friends, the situation to-day is well set forth in I Corinthians vi, 12, wherein St. Paul, the evangelist, says:

All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient.

[Applause.]

We can say to-day that without any loss of national honor or diminution of American rights it is not expedient for our people to go into the danger zone, and I can not bring myself, for one, to believe that such a warning issued to the American people surrenders in the slightest degree any American rights. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, a resolution adopted by this body warning American citizens not to travel upon armed merchant vessels of belligerents would have no legal effect whatever. It would be merely advisory. It ould not in the slightest degree cut off the right of any American citizen to travel on such ships. The right of American citizens to travel the high seas was not granted to them by our country, but was granted to them under the principles of international law. They do not owe it to the American Government, but they owe it to the practices of the civilized nations of the whole world.

Any resolution which this body might adopt could neither abridge nor could it to the slightest extent extend that right. The only effect that the adoption of such a resolution would have would be as the expression of an opinion, merely, unless we intend to indicate thereby that we will not protect our citizens, that we will not defend them in the exercise of their legal rights. To adopt such a resolution in the setting in which it is presented to us would be to go into bankruptcy upon our international liabilities and say to American citizens by implication, "You have the right. It is yours. We can not take it away, but we serve you with notice in advance that we are too cowardly, too contemptible, too craven, to defend you in its exercise." [Applause.]

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, to be permitted to make a legal argument upon this question, but it is impossible to do such a thing in the limited time given me. Therefore I am denied that privilege, but I want to say, not as a partisan of the President, not even in my capacity as a patriotic American citizen, but as a lawyer who has given this question much study, that there can not be any doubt that merchant vessels have the right to arm for defense, that they do not thereby change their status as merchant ships, and that neutrals traveling on such vessels retain all their rights and immunities.

I do not doubt that all of us, if interrogated in a private capacity, would say that we did not favor an American citizen taking passage upon one of these ships. It is the duty of our citizens not to take any chances in embroiling our country in war, and we should all of us unhesitatingly say so.

But, on the other hand, when we come here to vote upon this question we must take it in the setting in which it is presented. We must pass upon the question with all the implications and intendments which inhere in the entire situation. We can not act merely upon the abstract question of whether a citizen should ride or should not ride upon an armed merchant vessel.

Had this matter been presented to the Congress in a time of peace, the vote of warning would perhaps have been carried. Had it been presented in any less unfavorable setting than it is to-day, it would have received a much larger vote. But we must not forget the frame in which this picture is placed. Our country is negotiating with foreign countries. A question which was originally simple is so vastly widened in its aspect as to fill the whole horizon.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I think it might be well to remind the gentlemen who talk about partisanship that this resolution originated on that side of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the next place, the President either wants a vote on this or he does not. I want a vote. [Applause.] Eighty-five per cent of the men who have talked have said they were in favor of a warning. Do you presume Germany will not hear that? Do you think your talk will not go there, as well as the report of your vote? You talk one way and then propose to table a resolution in order to duck and say it never came to a showdown. [Applause and laughter.]

As I understand it, this is the Congress of the United States and not a rubber-stamp concern like there was a year ago. [Applause.] We have been asked for our opinion. We are given the privilege of expressing it, five minutes at a time, and then are offered the opportunity of voting for or tabling a resolution which you would not permit to have amended and in which you have left the objectionable things, because you knew if you took them out the President would come in about 1 to 10. [Applause.]

We had just as well call a spade a spade. I voted against the rule a while ago because I wanted an opportunity to do what the President has said, by correspondence with a committee—not with the House, but with the members of a committee—that he did not want, and which he now wants; a thing which a few days ago he wanted real badly, but is not sure now whether he wants it or not. [Applause.] The purpose of this whole program this afternoon is to give opportunity for exploitation to a lot of gentlemen who talk loudly and bravely about patriotism, but who never come to a show-down on this vote. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, on the question which we are discussing to-day, according to the letter of our Secretary of State on the 18th of January, and according to the secret orders of the British themselves in regard to armed merchantmen, we are not divided. The English look upon those as a part of the Admiralty. They have given their secret orders as to what is to be done, and we stand here between tweedledee and tweedledum trying to deny both what our own Secretary said and what the English Government recognizes. [Applause.] I do not imagine if instead of that being a warship or a merchant vessel it was a wagon loaded with ammunition, with two armed soldiers on it, traveling between the lines, that we would vote to save the fellow citizen of ours who got his head shot off. These munition boats are trying all the time to use the cheapest insurance they can get, and that is an American citizen aboard. [Applause.]

Now I am not pro-German or pro-ally, but I am pro-United States and have pro-horse sense. [Laughter and applause.] You men on that side of the House do not dare come to a showdown on a vote, and you know it. [Applause.]

Talk about standing by the President. Every speech you have made has undermined him this afternoon. By your words you are condemned out of your own mouths as to what you really believe, and are trying to make a play here solely for the purpose of saying that he was vindicated. How can he be vindicated? If he wants the opinion of this House, let him have it. If he does not, stand up and say so like men, instead of coming in here and talking about patriotism on that side. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member, has reported the so-called McLemore resolution to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table. I am in accord with the position the committee has taken because I believe that diplomatic negotiations involving momentous questions of international law and of good faith affecting the friendly relations of this Government with other nations and the future welfare of mankind are matters to be conducted by the President with foreign countries through the usual diplomatic channels.

But the Committee on Rules, acting, I presume, in conformity with the expressed desire of the President of United States, now submits to the House a proposition calling for a vote in order to determine the attitude of the Members with respect to the McLemore resolution. Personally I am ready for the test. I shall register my vote against the proposition by voting in favor of the motion to lay it on the table.

The undisguised question, if I correctly understand it, is whether American citizens have the right to travel on belligerent merchantmen that are armed for defensive purposes only. The answer to this question is a matter of international law and not a consideration of sentiment. My own examination of the law and precedents together with the opinions of distinguished lawyers on this question have led me to the conclusion that Americans have this right in accordance with a principle of international law that has been well established for centuries.

Entertaining this view, therefore, I can not lend my support to any proposition of compromise. There are some things which can not be compromised. One of them is an established American right. [Applause.] As a Member of the American Congress I deem it my first duty to uphold and defend the rights of American citizens. Any action which would tend to injure or abridge those rights is not the better part of statesmanship. [Applause.]

More than once since the origin of this debate have I heard it openly averred that a failure at this crisis to warn Americans against traveling on the merchant vessels of belligerents will inevitably lead us into war. Personally I am not ready to yield to such an imitation of prophecy. I hope that war may never come, but if it does come, and as a Nation we are called upon to face it, my own conviction is that it will be less likely to follow from a steadfast enunciation of our rights than from a stupid renunciation of them. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this is a time for genuine and not adulterated patriotism. [Applause.] It is a time when the dominant passion animating the bosom of America should be the protection of her unquestioned rights and the maintenance of her established laws with unabated vigor and virility. Without this, sir, there is no force in our nationality and no meaning in our flag. [Applause.]

The occasion then, it seems to me, has come again when the American people must reassert their conception of the real significance of that flag. If it stands for anything, Mr. Speaker, if it floats with any definite aim or purpose on land or on sea, if it typifies in the glorious colors that make up its graceful folds any principle that loyal Americans must adhere to, I apprehend it must be the expression of American rights as the laws and customs and traditions of this mighty Republic proclaim those rights. [Applause.] Away from that conception, sir; may we never permit ourselves to stray.

It is to that ensign of civil and religious liberty we owe our glorious retrospect as we turn our vision back through the decades that have thus far marked the course of our national honor and distinction.

And, sir, as we stand here to-day and endeavor with our weak human vision to penetrate the glories we hope will be ours to enjoy in the future, let us not commit ourselves to the performance of an action that would anywhere mar our American rights or minimize our American security. Let that flag, the symbol of a Nation's faith, remain forever unstained and unsullied upon the lofty heights of its hitherto undisturbed grandeur representing the full fruition of democracy's triumphs in the past and the everlasting guaranty of its security in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I depart from the subject now under consideration. It seems to me that it is the graces of life which really make life worth living, and in the midst of a debate of some intensity and importance I beg leave to remind the House that 66 years ago to-day the distinguished, the impartial, the beloved Speaker of the House first saw the light of day. [Prolonged and general applause.]

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, I desire to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], not only for this kindness but for numerous others, and from the bottom of my heart I thank the House for this splendid demonstration of its affection.

When James A. Garfield was elected to succeed Allen G. Thurman in the United States Senate and some Democrat made a speech very complimentary to Gen. Garfield, he denominated that kind of remarks as the "flowers that grow over the walls of party politics," and so I regard this. This House is to be relied on always to show kind personal regard for its membership, no difference what the politics may be. I am particularly under deep obligations to the Members—Democrats, Republicans, Progressives, and Independents—for innumerable evidences of their love. It is worth 66 years of laborious life to receive such an ovation by the House of Representatives.

There is one other remark I wish to make. If this country is ever in danger, there will be no party divisions here. [Applause.] We are all Americans and we are all patriots, and any man who insinuates anything else simply degrades his intellect. [Applause.] In peace we are "distinct as the billows"; in war we are "one as the sea." [Applause.]

I remember a great day in this House, and the older Members here remember it, when Mr. Speaker CANNON, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, on the 8th of March, 1898, brought a bill into this House, and the House of Representatives, without a man missing, Democrats, Republicans, Populists, and Silverites, performed the most stupendous piece of confidence ever seen in this world since the morning stars first sang together for joy, by voting into the hands of the President of the United States, William McKinley, $50,000,000, without strings and without restrictions. As a Democrat of Democrats it gives me pleasure to state that it is my profound conviction that William McKinley never violated that stupendous trust. [Applause.] As an American, proud of my country, I do not believe that any man ever held that great office or ever will hold it who would violate such a trust. [Applause.]

Again thanking you, the debate will proceed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the time had already been allotted, and I promised the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to ask unanimous consent that the time consumed by me, which he yielded to me, should not be taken out of his time. [Applause.] I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time occupied in this proceeding be not taken out of the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I deem it a very great honor to have the opportunity of speaking next after the exercises which have just preceded. I want to add my modest words of congratulation and praise to those of our minority leader, in the expressions that he has made toward our beloved Speaker. [Applause.]

We are to-day witnessing and participating in a very remarkable event. It is doubtful whether any procedure in the American Congress has ever been watched with more widespread interest throughout the world. Greater days have been recorded in the annals of Congress, but none of more far-reaching interest. I say this, because it is very evident that the interest of the world is centered here, very largely for the reason that it is generally thought the subject is a much greater and more important one than is actually before us.

I shall vote to table the McLemore resolution. Yesterday my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] stated that the McLemore resolution is a genuine proposal, and that he would prefer to vote on that resolution without the change of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." As frequently happens, I differ with my esteemed colleague. I should not consider that the McLemore resolution was a test in any sense of the sentiment of the House for or against warning the American citizens relative to passage on armed belligerent ships.

Mr. Speaker, if 999 American citizens out of every 1,000 were asked to-morrow what was before Congress yesterday they would reply, "Congress was considering whether it would vote confidence in President Wilson in his desire to offer protection to American citizens on armed vessels of belligerent powers." Vote "Yes; stick up for American rights against any or all foreigners" is the answer shouted back by the American people. [Applause.] How far is this conception from the actual reality? I say this situation has been intentionally brought about for the very purpose of having this sentiment expressed. The exact facts are these:

On February 22 Mr. MCLEMORE, whose congressional autobiography shows an inheritance of "a storm" and a predisposition for adventure and excitement, introduced a now famous resolution. No one reading this resolution would be disposed to accuse its author of having the power of diplomatic expression. It takes up four pages of printed matter, but in only two lines has anything worthy of consideration been stated. These two lines are:

> And in case American citizens do travel on such armed belligerent ships that they do so at their own risk.

This resolution would have gone the way of thousands of other documents and bills—made good waste paper—except for one thing. President Wilson, with his keen insight into English expression, realized that this resolution would be so objectionable that it never could be adopted, so instead of leaving it peacefully slumbering in a dusty pigeonhole of the Committee on Foreign Affairs we are suddenly informed that this resolution must be tabled in order that, by inference, the people will say President Wilson has been indorsed by Congress. What a situation! A few days ago the Democratic leaders were soft-pedalling the resolution, but when the White House passed the word up they jump with special rules and all the Democratic machinery to table the resolution. It was effectively tabled when in committee. Why not leave it there? The committee now having reported it adversely, under parliamentary rules it is still on the table. Why these continued efforts to resurrect a worthless resolution?

If a straight vote on warning or no warning has been wanted, why did not the President and his congressional errand boys bring that question before us? For my part I should consider American citizens had received all the warning needed without action here. The press of the country has been filled for days and weeks with notices of attendant danger in travel. There should be no need of an official warning to any American citizen to keep off of belligerent vessels. Personal safety coupled with common sense ought to warn every American to keep off such vessels at the present time irrespective of the duty every American owes his country by not exposing himself in such a way as to involve the country in war. I am opposed to any official curtailment of the rights of American citizens and therefore am opposed to the warning. I am convinced that it is within the authority of the Executive, who at this time is Mr. Wilson, to protect the rights of Americans at home, abroad, and on the high seas, and that such power is given the Executive by the Constitution itself.

So were the question of warning or no warning actually before us, I should vote "no." The actual question is whether we shall vote to table an impossible and improper resolution. I shall vote "yes"—not at the request of President Wilson, but in spite of his request.

Mr. Speaker, I am a red-blooded American and favor American doctrines and principles against all comers [applause], but I shall not deceive myself or my constituents that by action on this resolution I am doing more than my duty as an American. I shall not lead myself or them to think that I am thereby following the leadership of or in any way giving a personal indorsement to President Wilson.

The McLemore resolution merited no prominence, in my opinion. No good purpose was accomplished by its introduction; nothing was gained by using it as an instrument for congressional action. President Wilson again showed his dictatorial methods in insisting on adverse action upon it. The question the American people think is before us is not here. No answer has been made to the question whether or not warning should be given to Americans on armed belligerent vessels. No vote of confidence in President Wilson personally can be implied or inferred. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, it is true, as the gentleman from Missouri has said, that this proposition originated on this side of the House; but I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that no one on this side of the House is proud of that fact, with perhaps the single exception of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE], who has enjoyed the spotlight of notoriety that never would have been his but for this freak resolution of whereases. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, these are days for patriotic officeholders as well as for patriotic common citizens, and, regardless of any man's political affiliations, he should place the interests of his country and his flag first. The really traitorous American who in this crisis which confronts America demands his rights upon the seas deserves no sympathy and no protection. While I believe that the President should give his advice to his fellow countrymen to beware of travel on the armed ships of the warring nations, I can not support this resolution for this reason. In my opinion it is an unwholesome mass of conglomerated hodgepodge which, instead of being laid on the table, should be torn into tatters and scattered to the March winds, never to be brought back into these Halls to worry the minds and bother the hearts of you Representatives of the American people. [Applause and laughter.]

In my humble judgment, after a painstaking and careful analysis of this McLemore resolution, I have come to the conclusion that by its adoption there would follow in its wake confusion worse confounded. [Applause.] I want to see the President of the United States take some action which would prevent foolhardly or fortune-seeking Americans endangering the peace, the happiness, the homes, and the lives of 100,000,000 of their fellow countrymen. I believe that to embroil this Nation now, after so many anxious months, in a war in which there is no compelling interest, either of honor or of safety, for our being embroiled will seem to sensible citizens a wicked thing to do. But the whole situation is in the hands of the President, and Congress as yet has no business to interfere with one of the gravest crises in the history of this Republic. [Applause.]

Oh, how true the words of a Boston friend who wrote a few days ago that both country and Congress have learned enough about the results of modern war to realize that it is almost national suicide, that it means untold suffering and brings a nation to the verge of bankruptcy, that its only possible excuse is to preserve national integrity!

When the State Department hinted to the allies that the United States was contemplating adopting the policy of regarding armed merchant ships as auxiliary cruisers, the step which has brought us so near to war was taken. The allies refused to be influenced by the semithreat and Germany took it up. Together with this, the stress which the President repeatedly laid in his Lusitania notes upon the fact that that vessel was unarmed did much to bring about the difficult diplomatic position of this country.

Most leaders now question the theory that a nation must go to war merely to save the faces of its clumsy diplomats. In the history of the world anxiety for diplomatic reputations has too often been the cause of war. The notion that a foreign minister, an ambassador, or even an executive can maneuver his country into a position from which war is the only honorable escape is not a democratic ideal. Some of our representatives are sufficiently free from Old World tradition to appreciate this.

Three classes of Americans are traveling through the war zone upon merchant ships. Some of them are bent upon business concerning munitions of war; some of them travel for pleasure; still others are connected with war relief work. Those who have business with foreign armies are in a risky occupation. If the pleasure seekers come to grief, they may be pitied without doing anyone any harm. As for the men and women anixous to bind up the wounds of war's victims, they would be the last to wish anyone to go to war upon their account; but they alone deserve every protection. [Applause.]

No American has his rights abridged when he is warned to keep away from danger, and surely there is no honor in protecting a principle which, carried out, would bring no good to any man, but which would, in fact, fail to perform the task that had called forth such a course—the protecting of life. Would war insure the privilege of traveling the seas in safety? Common sense fails to disclose what of "honor," that is so much talked about, would be left should we sent 10,000 lives after an initial few lost through insistence upon entering the confines of a death struggle, where the law of self-defense is always supreme. We shall have this borne in upon us sooner or later, my countrymen, because it is nature's, not a man-made, law. [Long-continued applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman his expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I perhaps owe an apology to the House for again occupying the floor on this question, but up to this time I have refrained, and purposely refrained, from expressing any opinion concerning the real question of the rights of American citizens to travel upon armed merchant ships of belligerent nationality. I had hoped that that occasion would not arise in this House, but we have it before us, and I feel that it is my duty, so long as we must vote upon it, to express my views with reference to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen have said repeatedly throughout this debate that this proposition of Americans traveling upon armed merchant ships is an unquestioned right under international law. With reference to that I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that upon January 18, a little over six weeks ago, the present Secretary of State, in a note written to the allied powers, used this language with reference to what is now said to be an unquestioned right. He said:

> In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declaration by the belligerent Governments, I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal rights, which may be denied on account of new conditions.

"Doubtful legal rights" is what the State Department termed this on the 18th day of January. When since then did it become an unquestioned legal right, concerning which there can be no difference of opinion upon the part of patriotic Americans?

The note concludes with this language:

> I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government, and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question that presents itself to us is, Shall we by voting to table this McLemore resolution say that this right which six weeks ago was a doubtful right—that this right which six weeks ago the Government said was so doubtful that it was considering instructing its officials to treat armed merchant vessels as war vessels—shall we say by voting to table the McLemore resolution that that right is now so clear and unquestioned that this House, if called upon, will be ready to vote for a declaration of war against Germany in case an American citizen loses his life upon one of these armed merchant vessels?

Mr. Speaker, I am not ready to so vote, and because I am not ready I propose to vote against tabling the McLemore resolution, because if it is not tabled there will then be an opportunity to amend it, expressing the convictions of the House, giving the House an opportunity to vote for a simple resolution of warning, and thereby give notice to your President and to my President that in the opinion of this House that right is not so clear, is not so unquestioned, as to justify this country in going to war for a violation of it. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I can not listen to this debate or take part in it myself without expressing my deep regret that the question has ever been brought before the House under present conditions. There is little of that calm deliberation without which a wise conclusion can not be reached.

On the surface the question seems to be merely whether this Government ought to advise its citizens not to take passage on an armed merchant ship of a nation which is at war. On that question, if it stood alone, if there were no complications, if there were no interference with other things, and if I were to speak the sentiments of my own heart, I would without hesitation advise any man that contemplates sailing on such a vessel, that he had better take a vessel sailing under a neutral flag, preferably the flag of the United States. [Applause.]

But although that may seem on the surface to be the question, it is important that we look more deeply and see what may be beneath the surface. There is a controversy between the United States and Germany on one question, between the United States and Great Britain on another question—delicate controversies, and of great importance, that should make this House hesitate to interfere by passing a resolution that can have no legal effect.

The resolution now before the House is not a bill that would become law if passed, it is not a joint resolution that would have the effect of law, it is not a concurrent resolution that would go to the Senate, it is an expression of opinion of this House only. If passed here by unanimous vote it would have no more legal effect than a similar resolution passed in a chamber of commerce in any American city. [Applause.] Its only conceivable effect would be to embarrass this Government in its negotiations with foreign powers. [Applause.] There is no proposal to give it any legal effect, it is only an expression of opinion about the business of another department of the Government.

What does lie beneath the surface? The question concerning armed merchantmen and their status did not arise in connection with the submarine controversy. It was not until February 4, 1915, that Germany announced her "war-zone" policy, and it was some weeks later when submarine vessels were first used against merchant ships in the war zone. It was five months earlier, in September, 1914, that this Government found it necessary to give its ruling on the status of armed merchant ships of belligerent nations in our ports. Our Government ruled upon it in a memorandum which was handed to the German ambassador. It bears date of September 19, 1914, and the essential part of it reads as follows:

THE STATUS OF ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

A. A merchant vessel of belligerent nationality may carry an armament and ammunition for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship of war.

B. The presence of an armament and ammunition on board a merchant vessel creates a presumption that the armament is for offensive purposes, but the owners or agents may overcome this presumption by evidence showing that the vessel carries armament solely for defense.

C. Evidence necessary to establish the fact that the armament is solely for defense and will not be used offensively, whether the armament be mounted or stowed below, must be presented in each case independently at an official investigation. The result of the investigation must show conclusively that the armament is not intended for, and will not be used in, offensive operations.

In reply to that ruling, Ambassador Gerard telegraphed from Berlin, under date of October 15, 1914, a memorandum which he received from the German foreign office. The following is an extract from it:

An official notice appearing in the Westminster Gazette of September 21, 1914, states that the Department of State at Washington has ruled that ships of belligerent nations when equipped with ammunition and armament shall be treated nevertheless, while in American ports, as merchant ships, provided the armament serves for defensive purposes only. This ruling wholly fails to comply with the principles of neutrality. The equipment of British merchant vessels with artillery is for the purpose of making armed resistance against German cruisers. Resistance of this sort is contrary to international law, because in a military sense a merchant vessel is not permitted to defend itself against a war vessel, an act of resistance giving the warship * * * with crew and passengers.

To that statement, under date of November 7, 1914, Mr. Lansing, then Acting Secretary of State, replied:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 7, 1914.

Your 515, October 15. The Government of the United States is obliged to dissent from the views of the German Government as expressed in your telegram in regard to the treatment to be accorded armed merchant vessels of belligerent nationality in neutral ports. The practice of a majority of nations and the consensus of opinion by the leading authorities on international law, including many German writers, support the proposition that merchant vessels may arm for defense without losing their private character and that they may employ such armament against hostile attack without contravening the principles of international law.

The purpose of an armament on a merchant vessel is to be determined by various circumstances, among which are the number and position of the guns on the vessel, the quantity of ammunition and fuel, the number and sex of the passengers, the nature of the cargo, etc. Tested by evidence of this character the question as to whether an armament on a merchant vessel is intended solely for defensive purposes may be readily answered, and the neutral Government should regulate its treatment of the vessel in accordance with the intended use of the armament.

This Government considers that in permitting a private vessel having a general cargo, a customary amount of fuel, an average crew, and passengers of both sexes on board, and carrying a small armament and a small amount of ammunition, to enjoy the hospitality of an American port as a merchant vessel it is in no way violating its duty as a neutral. Nevertheless it is not unmindful of the fact that the circumstances of a particular case may be such as to cause embarrassment and possible controversy as to the character of an armed private vessel visiting its ports. Recognizing, therefore, the desirability of avoiding a ground of complaint, this Government, as soon as a case arose, while frankly admitting the right of a merchant vessel to carry a defensive armament, expressed its disapprobation of a practice which compelled it to pass upon a vessel's intended use, which opinion, if proven subsequently to be erroneous, might constitute a ground for a charge of unneutral conduct.

As a result of these representations no merchant vessels with armaments have visited the ports of the United States since the 10th of September. In fact, from the beginning of the European war but two armed private vessels have entered or cleared from ports of this country, and as to these vessels their character as merchant vessels was conclusively established.

Please bring the foregoing to the attention of the German Government, and in doing so express the hope that they will also prevent their merchant vessels from entering the ports of the United States carrying armaments even for defensive purposes, though they may possess the right to do so by the rules of international law.

LANSING.

It should be observed that in this note of November 7, 1914, while recognizing the right of a merchant vessel to carry an armament for defense, this Government nevertheless expressed its disapprobation of the practice. Mr. Speaker, it is not hard with that in mind to reconcile the letter of January 18 with the present stand of our Government. It has been consistent with the stand taken November 7, 1914. [Applause.]

In the memorandum of October 15, 1914, from which I have already quoted, the German Government proceeded to say of armed merchant ships—

It is a question whether or not ships thus armed should be admitted into ports of a neutral country at all. Such ships, in any event, should not receive any better treatment in neutral ports than a regular warship, and should be subject at least to the rules issued by neutral nations restricting the stay of a warship. If the Government of the United States considers that it fulfills its duty as a neutral nation by confining the admission of armed merchant ships to such ships as are equipped for defensive purposes only, it is pointed out that so far as determining the warlike character of a ship is concerned, the distinction between the defensive and offensive is irrelevant. The destination of a ship for use of any kind in war is conclusive, and restrictions as to the extent of armament affords no guarantee that ships armed for defensive purposes only will not be used for offensive purposes under certain circumstances.

So that already on October 15, 1914, we had received from the German Government notification that she would expect us to intern those ships if we recognized them as warships—treat them as we did the German warships at Norfolk. How long do you suppose——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member of the committee, and I promised to yield him five minutes more, and do so.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I can not yield with so little time. If we intern the warships of Germany and refuse to intern those ships that Germany claims are warships of the enemy, after we have taken action that admits that Germany is right, what ground have we to stand on? If we refuse to intern them, we have another serious dispute with Germany and no international law to support us. If, on the other hand, we do intern them, how long can we keep out of serious controversy with Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Russia. These nations may arm more and more of their merchant vessels and insist upon standing on the right which we have recognized.

As a matter of fact, British armed merchant ships are not coming to our ports at present, and have not been coming for more than a year. All this talk about men getting on "powder ships" and defending shipments of munitions of war by the presence of American passengers on board has nothing to do with the case. Germany is not claiming any right to torpedo those vessels. They carry ammunition. They carry contraband, but they are not armed. Germany is claiming the right to torpedo armed merchant vessels and, with the exception of a few of Italian nationality, none are coming to our ports at all. We have citizens in other countries, however, evicted, some of them, by the laws of the country, who must take passage upon armed vessels or none at all. Shall we deny to those people our protection when they have contributed not at all to their own danger? [Applause.]

So far as international law is concerned, the Japanese naval war code of 1904, the Italian code of 1877, the United States code of the year 1900, the case of the Panama, an armed merchant ship plying between New York and Spanish ports for three years previous to our Spanish War, and captured as a merchant ship—all these things indicate that the practice of arming merchant ships has not been abolished. It is recognized in the naval code of the United States of 1900, was recognized in the general orders issued in 1898 during the Spanish War, recognized in the Japanese naval war code of 1904. The decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the Nereide has been quoted here. It is quite true that Justice Story dissented, but he dissented only from the decision which disposed of the neutral property on board the Nereide. In his dissenting opinion Justice Story declared that the right of a belligerent merchant ship to carry arms was unquestioned. There was no dissent on that point. Our own law approved on January 25, 1798, specifically authorized American merchant ships to arm themselves in defense against any vessel, merchant ship, privateer, or warship flying the French colors. That was in the time of our little war that is hardly mentioned in the shorter histories, our naval war with France from 1798 to 1800.

I believe, taking into consideration the naval codes of the nations I have mentioned, there is an unbroken line of decisions and of precedents and of laws from 200 years ago down to 1904, at least. Merchant ships may be taken over and converted into warships. In old times merchant ships might be commissioned as privateers. It is another class that bothers us—that is, merchant ships that remain merchant ships and carry arms. They are not commissioned to make war, they are not licensed to prey on the enemy's commerce, they are permitted to carry arms to defend themselves while they are engaged in their ordinary business—carrying freight and passengers. That is what is meant by defensive armament—that it may be used to protect them in their business. The offensive purpose of a vessel is obvious when the vessel is commissioned, when she carries letters of marque. But when she carries a certificate of registry and gets clearance papers, showing the port she sails from and the port she goes to, and there is proof the vessel is bound upon an ordinary voyage attending to its ordinary business, whatever armament she carries under the old law, still recognized, was considered armament for defensive purposes, the purpose of the ship being shown by her papers, by the evidence in support of those papers, and by other evidence of a character indicated at some length in the memorandum of September 19, 1914, a portion of which I have already quoted. It must be remembered that in every case the burden of proof rests on the owners of the armed vessel. They must show conclusively that the armament is not intended for, and will not be used in, offensive operations. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], it seems to me, confuses the issue that confronts this House to-day. We are not concerned with the right of these armed vessels to enter or clear from American ports. We are concerned with the American citizens riding on these vessels, and the only question is between those citizens and this Government, and by taking action upon that question we do not change international law. The gentleman has read some notes of this Government, and I want to read a part of a note from the Secretary of State of this Government to the German Government while this war has been in progress. The concluding sentence of that note to Ambassador Gerard is this:

> Please bring the foregoing to the attention of the German Government, and in doing it express the hope that they will also prevent their merchant vessels from entering the ports of the United States carrying armament even for defensive purposes, though they may possess the right to do so by the rules of international law.

Mr. Speaker, is that asking the great German Government to do a dishonorable thing? If it is not, is this House dishonorable in asking our citizens to remain off of these armed merchant vessels that we asked the great German Government, and by implication other Governments, to keep from the ports of the United States? [Applause.] Gentlemen talk, Mr. Speaker, about this being dishonorable. It may be all right for some gentlemen upon the Republican side to raise that question, but when Democrats upon this floor have approved the course of this administration in warning citizens out of Mexico, how can they stand here to-day and vote against warning our citizens off of these armed merchant vessels? [Applause.] And again, the State Department of this Government is curtailing the rights of American citizens to passports in foreign countries. Here is the rule they have laid down:

> The department does not deem it appropriate or advisable to issue passports to persons who contemplate visiting belligerent countries merely for pleasure, recreation, touring, or sight-seeing.

The gentleman may say that that relates only to pleasure, but if an American citizen has a right to a passport he has a right to it to travel for any purpose that he sees fit.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman does not contend that an American, because he has a passport, has the right to go to a foreign country without the consent of that country?

Mr. IGOE. No; but if we deny an American citizen a passport, we are curtailing a right he has from this Government [applause], a right that he gets from this Government, to which he pays taxes and to whose protection he is entitled. The Government of Sweden tried to protect its citizens, according to all reports, and has called upon them to stay off of these armed merchant vessels, and no one in this House has accused that country of doing a dishonorable thing. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to approve the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to lay this resolution on the table, because I believe it is the proper solution of a very ugly matter. These are no times for partisanship.

The President's extraordinary letter to Chairman POU, of the Rules Committee, has created a crisis in the affairs of the Nation that calls upon every Member of Congress to exercise the calm judgment of an exalted patriotism. We should forget that there are such institutions as the political parties to which we belong and consider this matter, so fraught as it is with danger to the peace of the Nation, as Americans, standing shoulder to shoulder, without regard to our political beliefs, in an earnest effort to preserve with honor the peace, the happiness, the prosperity, and the sunshine that now abides in every American home.

The pending measure is in itself simple and easy to understand, but the danger arises from the contents of the President's letter, in which he nowhere states why he desires this resolution defeated; and this failure is the vice of the entire situation, brought about solely by the neglect of the President to recognize the unbroken practice in the Nation of communicating by written or oral message his wishes to Congress, together with the reasons why he desires those wishes complied with. Instead of doing this he writes a letter to Chairman POU, of the Rules Committee, carefully gives it to the newspapers before it is mailed, and probably unintentionally omits to state why he desires the McLemore resolution defeated.

If the President desires the McLemore resolution defeated because a public discussion of it is interfering with our negotiations with foreign Governments, he would receive my support, notwithstanding the fact that the Foreign Affairs Committee was told by him on February 22, the day the McLemore resolution was introduced in Congress, that it was having such an effect, and 10 days later, in the Pou letter, demanded that it be brought out for full and complete discussion. I can not understand why a public discussion is not as dangerous to our foreign negotiations to-day as it was on the 22d of February. Neither can I understand why he should tell us in the Pou letter to do the very thing which 10 days before he said was paralyzing his negotiations with the German Empire. Does the President desire the McLemore resolution defeated because it interferes with the prerogatives of his office? If this be the reason, I will be glad to vote according to his wishes. Does the President desire the McLemore resolution defeated because it has been improperly presented to the House and involves a lot of matters with which none of us are in harmony? If so, I will vote with him. But if he desires the House to pass upon this vital question whether or not American citizens should be warned from armed merchantmen of belligerent nations without sending us a message, as all former Presidents have done under similar circumstances, accompanied by all of the correspondence and other data connected with the matter, then I am against him with all the power that is in me.

A proper determination of our rights in this matter unquestionably involves a careful consideration of both facts and law. The law may be perfectly plain, but what are the facts to which to apply that law? Most of the facts are somewhere on the Atlantic Ocean between Washington and Berlin, and how the United States Senate is ever going to determine the question, as it is attempting to do, without the facts, has very much aroused my curiosity. The President has but to follow the unbroken practices of the former occupants of the White House, and as Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Cleveland, and others did, present to Congress all of the correspondence, together with all data tending to throw light upon the question, by a proper message, and Congress will gladly do its duty, but to have this question, around which revolves the peace of the Nation, sent to us in this loose manner is, to say the least, extremely unfortunate, and if Congress attempted to decide it in the absence of the facts it would not be doing its full duty to the Nation. We have absolutely nothing before us, except hearsay, showing the number, the caliber, and range of the guns with which these vessels are armed. We have nothing before us showing whether that armament has been used offensively or defensively. If used offensively the vessel, under the rules of international law, becomes a pirate and certainly our citizens should remain off of it. If used only for defensive purposes our citizens would probably have the technical right, foolhardy as it is, to travel thereon. All of which are material facts necessary to a proper decision of this important matter. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am curious to find out what has become of all those men on the Democratic side of the House who for the last three or four weeks have been talking in the cloakrooms about the international situation. [Laughter.] The vote here to-day has not disclosed any of them. They have all faded away.

What is the question before us when it is stripped of the fog? The question is, Shall we speak for the American people? I consider this a domestic question. The question of notifying American citizens not to ride on belligerent armed ships is not an international question, according to my view. We have a perfect right to so advise them; and, in fact, we have a right to enact a law to prevent them. Then, what is the question before us? Does the President want our advice as to what he shall do in the negotiations with the belligerent nations abroad or does he simply want us to lay this resolution on the table? Judging from the vote taken to-day and the attitude of the Democrats upon that question, I think that they construe his meaning to be that he wants no advice.

There is no division of sentiment among the American people as to what shall be done to sustain the President of the United States when the honor of the Nation is involved. Every man upon this floor and every man in the Union will stand as one to protect the rights of America and her citizens. [Applause.]

But there is no question here to-day which calls for that kind of unity of action? The question before us is, Have we the right to advise our citizens to so exercise their privileges of citizenship as to not involve the rest of the hundred million of people in America? That is the question. [Applause.] And I believe that no man, no matter what his privileges under citizenship may be, has the patriotic right to so exercise that right as to involve the business and the happiness and prosperity of America. We ought to be for America first, last, always. [Applause.] And I believe if we had the opportunity to-day to vote for a simple resolution of warning it would receive almost the unanimous vote of this House. If that question were submitted to the American people, nine out of ten of them would vote to give the warning. And when we vote to-day to place this resolution upon the table we vote to refuse to consider the wishes of the American people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN].

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the great Napoleon once said that the time would come when all of Europe would be either Cossack or republic. I am neither a prophet nor am I the scion of a seer, but if I portend aright the signs all of Europe in the future will be republican and no part Cossack, and thus every European throne will be subverted and overturned.

Sir, if these aspirations, if these hopes of millions of people in Europe are to be finally realized, their freedom attained by this happy event, the question might well be propounded to this Congress, "Shall the American people and the American Republic maintain their independence, their freedom, and their liberty, or be suspended as a mere satrapy and dependency to the belt of some war lord in Europe whose eyes are red with the blood of Mars?"

It seems to me, sir, that we at this moment are about to approach the parting of the ways. We must either stand steadfastly by the traditions of this Republic, the laws of nations, the right of our people and the President, else, taking the other course, be driven and terrorized from the seas, whose highways belong to all the world and upon which are borne annually five thousand million dollars of our foreign trade.

We are not asked to put into concrete law anything by this resolution. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] said a few moments ago, this resolution does not seek to create any law. It is merely, sir, a request directed to the President of the United States to warn American people not to ride upon armed merchantmen of any one of the belligerent nations. Are they not already warned? Has not Germany already made her threat? Could the President's warning be more emphatic or Germany's action any less violative of the rights of neutral or international law? Armed merchantmen are not warships but carriers of passengers and freight with guns to protect them when attacked. This has been the law of nations for centuries.

Now, if by strict observance of international law, by remaining neutral as we are to-day, we are to get into trouble with Germany and the central powers, what might happen to the American people if we violate international law by passing this resolution, and thereby offend another group of powers now engaged in this awful hell of war, this holocaust across the sea? Much has been said in recent times of the so-called yellow peril in the Far East. Might we not become the target of that growing giant over there? Might she not undertake to seize the Philippines and Hawaiian Islands, seek to drive us from the Pacific, attempt to exclude our commerce from the Orient, not to mention the irreparable damage that might be inflicted upon our western coast or the world struggle that would follow? Had we thought, Mr. Speaker, that Japan is an ally of England to-day, and that to offend the allies by our attempt to violate international law as this resolution seeks to do, we might thereby imperil this Nation more than by obeying international law and defeating this resolution? If we are driven from one position by one power, we may expect to driven, sir, from other positions by other powers, until we finally abandon every right guaranteed to us by the law of nations, thus becoming contemptuous in the eyes of all the world.

In common with the great majority of the people of this country I hope that no American will endanger the peace of his Republic by venturing upon an armed merchantman; but it is the unquestioned right of all the people to travel the seas in times of war as well as in times of peace. If we accede to the demands of Germany, may we not likewise be driven to accede to the demands of England and her allies? The latter have rifled our mails, have restricted our commerce, have seized millions and multiplied millions of dollars worth of the products of our fields and factories, but we have not said they have a right to do these things, and these are questions yet to be settled and none of them so far have been settled. The President has sought to settle them all by diplomacy and not by the sword. I am willing to trust him and so are the American people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY].

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the rule just offered because it seems to me cowardly. It seems to me unfair to the President, who represents us in our foreign relations, when we side-step and decline to come out squarely and tell him where we stand. [Applause.] I know that I am voicing the feelings of 100 per cent of the people in the Central West when I say that party politics should be ignored and the President, as our representative, should receive our full support in all proper efforts to maintain the dignity of the United States and the safety of its citizens. I think we should have an opportunity to so vote. Also I am satisfied that 90 per cent of the people in my locality believe with me that American citizens should be requested to travel upon neutral ships and American vessels so far as it is possible to do so.

I think, without a doubt, three-fourths of the membership of this House would so vote if they were given a fair opportunity so to do. It seems to me very unfair to them and to the people they represent that they are prevented by a parliamentary quibble from so voting. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman's permission, I will occupy a little time now.

Mr. FLOOD. All right. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the situation of the country is grave, if we are to believe the President. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] says that there is no crisis. But the President asserts that one is imminent, and, pointing to the sparks flying everywhere in Europe, declares that he can not tell when some of these may fall here and the conflagration break out in the United States. Perhaps the possibility of such a conflagration—the threatening possibility that the war may involve this Nation—does not suggest a situation of extreme gravity—a crisis—to the gentleman from North Carolina, but it does to every other man of intelligence in the United States. [Applause.]

Before proceeding further, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I trust that I may be permitted a brief personal reference, though I am, of course, aware that, speaking generally, all references to one's self of a mere personal character are unworthy of the dignity of the House of Representatives, and in an especial sense unworthy of an occasion so important as this. And yet the circumstances are such that I feel it my duty—at least a duty to myself—to refer briefly to the charge which is being persistently repeated, that it is the nationality of one element among the constituency whom I am privileged to represent here which is responsible for my attitude on the great question now before the House. Only a few moments ago, in the lobby, a Member of the House called my attention to this morning's New York World, one of the greatest news gatherers in the world, on the front page of which is a copy of a letter ostensibly from a correspondent of some organization, saying that he had interviewed COOPER of Wisconsin and a number of other Representatives in Congress, perhaps 15 or 20, whom he names, and that COOPER was practically in league with the German Alliance to do its bidding and to be relied upon.

Concerning that statement I have no comment to make, except to say that it is a deliberate falsehood. [Applause.] I have not seen either the man who signed that letter or any other person pretending to represent or to be a correspondent or agent of that league or alliance; nor have I ever said or in any way intimated anything of that kind to any person.

But reports have been freely circulated that with me this is all a question of nationality. I have myself more than once heard suggestions to this effect. Yesterday while I was walking through the lobby one gentleman remarked to another as I passed, "Oh, he is that way; they are all Germans in his district." And the other said, "Yes; I understand they are all Dutch." [Laughter.] Both gentlemen, in these statements, gave evidence of their entire lack of information respecting the people of that district, and one of them especially betrayed his ignorance by showing that he was not aware of the difference between Dutch and German. [Laughter.]

Now, the majority of my constituents are not Germans. On the contrary, the Germans constitute a relatively small fraction of the electorate. There are Germans in the district, law-abiding, industrious, honorable, as good people as there are in the world. To be law-abiding, industrious, honorable, is characteristic of the Germans generally throughout the United States. [Applause.] It is characteristic also of those of my constituents, foreigners, so called, who came from other countries across the sea. They, too, are worthy citizens. In the aggregate they constitute a larger element of the population than do the Germans; and if the letters which I receive are any criterion, a very considerable number of them are strongly pro-ally. But the larger portion of the population are native Americans, people whose ancestors for generations have lived in America. Most of these are descendants of men and women who moved from various eastern States and settled in Wisconsin in an early day. Of the old pioneers only very few still linger. Nearly all have passed away. But their descendants are there. And there, as elsewhere generally throughout the country, it is true that after the lapse of a comparatively few years the children of the poor immigrants from across the sea are indistinguishable from the descendants of the Pilgrims.

I trust that I may be pardoned for adding in this connection that I have no interests of any kind nor any relative in Germany or in any other country of the central powers. But in England there lives one who is very near and dear to me, "dear as are the ruddy drops that visit my anxious heart." She is there at the edge of London with her husband and little daughter. They have heard the roaring crash of the bombs from the Zeppelins. I fear—I fear—for them. But as an American, a Representative in the Congress of the United States, it is my first duty to remember my own country and to vote so as not needlessly to endanger the peace and safety of the great Republic whose welfare I am bound in every honorable way to protect. [Applause.]

This brings us to the question before the House; and I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the special rule governing this debate so limits the time that speakers have no opportunity for full discussion.

We have repeatedly heard it urged here that "we must follow the President"; "we must stand by the President."

Then let us see just what is the President's attitude. Let us have an exact understanding of the facts about it. There have been charges and denials as to his position, but we can get the President's attitude in mind very clearly by examining the letter of Chairman STONE, Senator from Missouri, to the President, which was published in the Washington papers of February 25. The Senator says:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Since Senator KERN, Mr. FLOOD, and I talked with you on Monday evening I am more troubled than I have been for many a day. I have not felt authorized to repeat our conversation.

Something that the President had said troubled Senator STONE "more than he had been troubled for many a day." In the same letter the Senator defines his own attitude. He says:

I think you understand my personal attitude with respect to the subject. As much and as deeply as I would hate to radically disagree with you, I find it difficult for my sense of duty and responsibility to consent to plunge this Nation into the vortex of this world war because of the unreasonable obstinacy—

What had the President said? The Senator wrote that he hated to disagree with him.

Much as I would hate to radically disagree with you, I find it difficult for my sense of duty and responsibility to consent to plunge this Nation into the vortex of this world war because of the unreasonable obstinacy of any of the powers, on the one hand, or, on the other hand, of foolhardiness, amounting to a sort of moral treason against the Republic, of our people recklessly risking their lives on armed belligerent ships. I can not escape the conviction that such would be so monstrous as to be indefensible.

The Senator earnestly declares that he is opposed to war in support of such "foolhardiness," such "moral treason against the Republic." He intimates that in this he disagrees with the President. What did the President say at that Monday night conference? Here is what the President said, as set forth in this letter of Senator STONE:

Furthermore, that you would consider it your duty, if a German warship should fire upon an armed merchant vessel of the enemy, upon which American citizens were passengers, to hold Germany to strict account.

Strict account! How is the President going to hold a belligerent nation "to strict account" in the midst of war except by handing passports to its representative and employing force? How otherwise than by becoming a party to the war can the United States hold a belligerent to strict account? Senator STONE declared that he hated to disagree with the President, but his sense of duty compelled him to oppose plunging into the vortex of war on any such pretext as that. The President said, "I would hold Germany to strict account."

On the next day, Tuesday, the Members of Congress heard all about what was said in that Monday night conversation, through reports emanating from the men who participated in it, and those reports agreed precisely with what Senator STONE understood to be the issue between him in favor of warning Americans not to risk their lives and the President opposed to warning them.

I invite attention now to what the President himself said in his letter in reply to Senator STONE:

If the clear rights of American citizens should unhappily be abridged or denied by any such action, we should, it seems to me, have in honor no choice as to what our own course would be.

"No choice!" Protect the foolhardy people at any hazard! "No choice!" There is but one thing to do when Americans thus risk their lives on armed belligerent ships. Enforce their rights! And Senator STONE would not have this country go to war for such a cause, and he hated to disagree with the President, and he was greatly troubled after that conversation with the President! What was it that the President had said? Answer me, not as partisans. Forget what Hallam called that worship of a party name which makes up the politics of vulgar minds. Do you propose at the call of party to forget your country? Do you say that if the ship which left for the zone of war two or three days ago, having on board an American who said in New York that he had run the blockade three or four times and enjoyed the thrill—do you say that if that ship be sunk and carry that reckless American to the bottom of the sea we will hold one of the belligerent nations to strict account? You have an opportunity to answer that question, and can answer it either as partisans or as patriots.

I digress here to say that the pending resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE] on the 22d of February, a considerable time after the Lansing letter of January 18, which I shall a little later read to the House. The resolution could not have been introduced on a better day than the birthday of George Washington, and while it contains in the long preamble and in the body of the resolution itself some features with which, perhaps, I do not agree, nevertheless the intent of the gentleman was worthy of praise. He introduced it for the purpose of having Americans duly warned so that they might not endanger their lives. His purpose was honorable and in strict accord with the spirit of the Lansing letter, and, in my judgment, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] would have done well not to hold up to ridicule one so well intentioned and honorable as is the gentleman who introduced this resolution.

Now, the President wished nothing to be done about this McLemore resolution. If I am to believe the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I do believe him, the President urged that no action be taken respecting the resolution, and, to use a common expression, asked the chairman and his Democratic colleagues, constituting a majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to sit on the lid. They obeyed and sat on it. They did not know that the President had changed his mind. They were not notified that he desired them to get off of the lid. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] But without warning them the President suddenly wrote a letter to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], a member of another committee, and in the opening sentence notified everybody that Mr. HENRY was in Texas. [Laughter.] Then, ignoring the committee which, under the rules of the House, had exclusive jurisdiction of the resolution, he requested the gentleman from North Carolina to have his committee bring the resolution before the House of Representatives. His letter continues:

This matter is of so grave importance, and lies so clearly within the field of Executive initiative, that I wish—

The trouble is that the President wants not only the right to take the initiative, but also the right to issue the ultimatum. [Applause on the Republican side.] Senator STONE, in that letter, betrayed it all—

I dislike to disagree with you, but I can not agree that this would be justification for going to war.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Amen!

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. TEMPLE, took much pains to emphasize the word "defense" when speaking of armed merchantmen. He contended that these merchantmen are armed for defense. Let us see whether they are armed exclusively for defense. The London Times of February 10, 1916, contains the following:

Armed liners.
The American note criticized.
Heavier guns needed.
By our naval correspondent.
The P. & O. steamer Kashgar, when off Malta on her way to India, saw a submarine periscope and fired at it—

The armed merchantman at once attacked the submarine by firing at it—obliging the boat to dive. It reappeared on the opposite side of the liner and was again fired at, if not hit, when the submarine dived and was seen no more. The Ellerman liner City of Marseilles also had a similar encounter off the Sardinian coast 10 days earlier. In her case the submarine opened fire without any warning, but after two shots the liner's gun got to work and discharged eight shells at the U boat, after which the latter disappeared.

Now follows a striking statement:

The third instance is that of a French ship, the Plata, owned by the Transports Maritimes, which, on January 27, sighted a submarine half a mile away. Fire was opened—

I pause here to remark that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. TEMPLE, has spoken, as also have other gentlemen, about these vessels always having their guns at the stern of the boat and only for defense.

I will read that again:

The third instance is that of a French ship, the Plata, owned by the Transport Maritimes, which on January 27 sighted a submarine half a mile away. Fire was opened from the stern of the steamer, and the hostile craft, believed to be struck in a vital part, soon dived and made off.

Armed purely for defense, it immediately attacks with its stern guns and hits the other craft in a vital part!

How conclusively all this shows the change in conditions and demonstrates that as against the submarine these armed merchant vessels are ships of war. This is exactly what was contended for by this Government in the Lansing letter of January 18.

Some day the Government of this United States may wish to use submarines in its own defense.

At this point I will read the letter of January 18 which Secretary of State Lansing sent to the belligerent powers, and demonstrate that it is not only the letter of Secretary Lansing but also the letter of the President of the United States. Let us see what were the views of the President and the Secretary in January upon this vastly important subject. The letter is most interesting:

Prior to the year 1915 belligerent operations against enemy commerce on the high seas had been conducted with cruisers carrying heavy armaments. In these conditions international law appeared to permit a merchant vessel to carry armament for defensive purposes without lessening its character as a private merchant vessel. This right seems to have been predicated on the superior defensive strength of ships of war, and the limitation of armament to have been dependent on the fact that it could not be used effectively in offense against enemy naval vessels, while it could defend the merchantmen against the generally inferior armament of piratical ships and privateers.

POWERLESS IN DEFENSE.

The use of the submarine, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

The President and Secretary Lansing say that even a small-caliber gun would make a merchantman strong enough to wage successful offensive warfare against a submarine. The letter goes on:

Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

In January we hear the President and Secretary saying that any armament on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

If a submarine is required to stop and search a merchant vessel on the high seas, and in case it is found that she is of an enemy character and that conditions necessitate her destruction and the removal to a place of safety of persons on board, it would not seem just nor reasonable that the submarine should be compelled, while complying with these requirements, to expose itself to almost certain destruction by the guns on board the merchant vessel.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; I have not the time to yield. The letter continues:

It would therefore appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

Here in January was our Government declaring that under present conditions it would be reasonable and just "that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever."

Some of these vessels are armed with 6-inch guns, some have four guns, and one of these inoffensive belligerent merchantmen, armed "only for defense" with 6-inch guns and with shells filled with high-power explosives, could have sunk any battleship of the glorious fleet that Farragut commanded during the Civil War.

I now ask especial attention to what is one of the most important paragraphs of the letter:

In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal right, which may be denied on account of new conditions.

The letter urges "the humane purpose of saving the lives of people rather than the insistence on doubtful legal right." And yet this right which was "doubtful" in January is the same right which, if violated, the President indicated to the men who called on that Monday night he would go to war to enforce. If it was doubtful in January, what has made it vital now? If it was honorable to write these views in January, why is it dishonorable to hold them now?

The letter proceeds:

I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration, conditioned on their enemies making a similar declaration.

It is the next paragraph which contains the evidence that the President was entirely familiar with the contents of this letter:

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government, and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

Who was "my Government"? Not the Postmaster General nor the Secretary of the Treasury. Who was "my Government"? Is it to be supposed that the President of the United States would permit Secretary Lansing to write a letter of this tremendous import to the belligerent nations without consulting him? If the President of the United States—and I do not believe it—is so lax in the discharge of his duty that he grants such power to a subordinate he ought not to be President. I acquit him of such neglect of duty, and I acquit Secretary Lansing of being so presumptuous as, upon his own initiative, to have written and mailed that letter. Of course, "my Government" in this letter means the President of the United States.

But it is said that we must not change the rules of the game while the game is going on. Let us see what "my Government" thought about that proposition on the 18th of January.

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

In January we see that the President was seriously considering instructing our officials to hold armed belligerent merchantmen to be auxiliary cruisers, because he said it would be only just and reasonable so to consider them.

My Democratic friends, do you pretend to believe when the President, through Secretary Lansing, informed those foreign Governments that he, the President, was seriously thinking of notifying our officials that under the changed conditions merchant ships ought not to be armed that he was trying to change the rules wrongfully? No; for he said that it would be right under the circumstances to hold armed belligerent merchantmen to be auxiliary cruisers.

Mr. Speaker, let me recapitulate the argument. The ordinary warship, other than the submarine, has greater offensive and defensive strength than has the armed merchantman. Therefore such merchantman when hailed by such a warship must submit to visit and search or to be captured or sunk.

On the other hand, the submarine is a warship which is weaker in offensive and defensive strength than is the armed merchantman. Therefore the President and Secretary said on January 18 that an armed merchantman ought to be considered as an auxiliary cruiser and be so treated by neutral and by belligerent Governments. Now, if such merchantman ought to be considered as an auxiliary cruiser—a ship of war—then American citizens ought to be warned that if they travel on such auxiliary cruisers into the zone of war they do so at their own risk.

Now, the submarine is a ship of war which we are making and may wish some time to use in our defense. And here is a question for us to meet now: Are we willing that Secretary Lansing or President Wilson, or both together, shall have the power to lay down a rule which will bind the United States in the use of submarines when, God forbid, we may be engaged in war? I pray that our country may never again be party to a war. But it is the duty of statesmanship to be provident of the future.

Suppose that we are engaged in a war with Japan. I speak with all kindness to Japan, because I have warm friends there, as I have warm Japanese friends in the United States; but it is the duty of statesmanship to be provident of the future.

Suppose that we are engaged in war with Japan, and a Japanese liner loaded with ammunition and armed with 6-inch guns should approach our Pacific coast to land that ammunition in Lower California, or elsewhere upon the coast, and suppose that you and I are on a submarine on that ocean, while our brothers, our friends, are battling, dying on shore in defense of the Nation. Must the rule be what the President and Secretary Lansing contended in January that it ought not to be; and can China demand that you and I, with hearts aching, shall stand back with our submarine because on board of this armed Japanese liner there are two Chinamen, citizens of a neutral State? [Applause.] I am unwilling to give any man—even though he be the President—the power to determine what the policy of the United States Government shall be as to the use of submarines. They are a new weapon. We make them; France makes them; England makes them; they all make them. I do not know what the future has in store for the United States. But if our fleet were driven from the sea our defense on water might depend upon the submarine alone. If war should come to us we will be united in support of the Government. But in time of peace must we stand by the President, who has changed his views so recently on this vastly important question—must we stand by the President no matter what he may do or demand? Is this Russia or is it America? Stand by the President? It is said that some of the ignorant of the Cossacks shout, "Stand by the Czar no matter what he may do." Stand by the President! I have great respect for the office of the Presidency and for the present incumbent of that exalted place, but in order for me to stand by a man it is first necessary that the man shall stand still [laughter] or, at least, be reasonably stationary. Are you going to stand by him as he stood on the 18th of January, when, without consulting anybody, he was seriously thinking of notifying our officials abroad of what, under the changed conditions, he considered the reason and justice of the law to be, in order to safeguard human life, or are you going to stand by him now, on the 7th of March, or will you stand by him in April?

Mr. Speaker, I find in the New York World of February 11 a dispatch, dated February 10, from its distinguished Washington correspondent which is of the utmost importance:

> The intention of the Teutonic allies is considered in official and diplomatic circles here to be a development of the memorandum proposing the disarming of merchant ships which Secretary Lansing recently sent to the entente powers. High officials of the State Department seemed disposed to consider the development broad enough to warrant the claim that the fundamental questions involved in the conduct of submarine warfare have been settled in accordance with the contention of the United States. This is based on the belief that, with Germany and Austria giving notice that they will sink without warning all armed ships, the two Governments can not legally claim the right to sink unarmed vessels. That is the principle for which the United States has so vigorously contended since the beginning of the negotiations over the conduct of submarine warfare.

You who have been called poltroon and coward, as I have, because you voice your honest convictions, listen to the New York World, the President's great newspaper friend:

> In view of this situation American citizens, it is stated by high authority, now may be warned that they will take passage aboard armed merchant ships at their own risk and be entitled to no more protection from the United States than if they had embarked upon a belligerent warship.

Who was the "high authority" that on the 10th day of February last told the distinguished correspondent of the New York World that American citizens may now receive warning that they travel on armed merchant ships at their own risk? There are only two men of "high authority" in the State Department—the President and the Secretary of State—and one or the other of them told the World's correspondent.

Mr. Speaker, we hear much about honor. The word "honor" has been loudly sounded here several times to-day. We have been called dishonorable, forgetful of the Nation's honor, because we wish to have people warned to keep off of armed ships going into the zone of war. The word "honor" is used in many different meanings and frequently without meaning. Like religion, it often sits lightly on the tongues of those whose hearts do not recognize it, and too often do we hear persons pledge their sacred honor who are bankrupt in all that is sacred or honorable. [Applause.] What are we doing that is dishonorable if we believe in the argument made by the President and Secretary of State on the 18th of January? And what is Germany to think? Germany acquiesced in that she agreed not to sink or attack unarmed merchantmen. What is Germany to think of this absolute reversal of the attitude of our Government?

I said in a published interview a few days ago what expressed my views on this general proposition:

> I am opposed to war except it be a war of defense, and then it should be in defense of something worth the sacrifice.

[Applause.]

And the loss of the life of that man who went from New York saying that he had already run the gauntlet of the blockade three times and enjoyed the thrill would not justify me in voting to send this Nation to war. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] have this afternoon eloquently depicted war's awful meaning to the soldiers who go to the front to suffer and die and to those they leave to suffer at home—the helpless women and children. War is not all pomp and pageantry. It is well that we be reminded of these things to-day, for the question now before us may at last prove to be one of peace or war. I never think of war but there comes back to me a scene that strongly impressed my youthful imagination.

A company of volunteers was drawn up in line at a village railroad station. Surrounded by a large crowd of relatives, friends, and neighbors, they awaited the arrival of the soon-expected train. There were handshakings, cheering words of encouragement and hope, and weeping good-bys. Amid all this my attention was called to one in the ranks of soldierly bearing and with a face expressive of great resolution, who shook the many outstretched hands and returned the good-bys with a pleasant smile and a cheery voice till the whistle of the train was heard, when a woman, leading a little child, made her way through the throng and reached out her hand to him. She was trying to look brave, but as he drew her to him and her lips met his farewell kiss, the gushing tears that told her heart's sorrow would not be restrained. But though the smile left his face and his eyes had a strange, faraway look, they were dimmed by no tears until she lifted up the little boy, saying, amid choking sobs, "Kiss Johnny." Then as he clasped the little fellow in his arms and pressed his lips to the tender cheek, I saw the strong breast heave, the firm lips tremble, and the tear drops roll down the bronzed cheek and over the rugged beard till they rested like glistening pearls on the fair face of the child. My own eyes refused to see more, and I turned away; but I had seen the last kiss that father's lips ever pressed to the cheek of little Johnny.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote to bring again those scenes in the land I love so well because some person insists on traveling on an armed belligerent merchantman into the zone of war. There are other ships on which he can go—American ships under the American flag. He is not obliged to travel on an armed belligerent vessel, nor should the Government be obliged to defend one who deliberately endangers the welfare of his fellow citizens and the peace of the Republic of the United States of America by recklessly insisting upon the exercise of a "doubtful legal right." [Loud applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, there is a sharp division of opinion in this House. Of course we all recognize that; but there is no division of opinion upon one point. We are all agreed that peace must be maintained, if peace can be maintained with honor. The gentleman who has just spoken dealt very eloquently with the horrors of war. There is no dissent from the proposition that war is horrible. There is no occasion to voice that sentiment to-day. The only question is, What course should be pursued by this House in order to avoid war and to avoid it honorably?

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the surer and the sounder and the wiser way to avoid war is to support the President and not tie his hands. [Applause.] And, Mr. Speaker, I favor, in pursuance of that course, the killing of this McLemore resolution as promptly and as effectively as we possibly can. If in the course of killing it the death be made painless, I have no objection to that. A great deal of stress has been laid upon the floor of this House to-day on the statement that we ought to have a square vote, yes or no, on the McLemore resolution, and that tabling it was an evasion. That can not be so. Every man who has been a member of a debating society, of a fraternal organization, or even of a high school club knows perfectly well from the moment that he joins that institution that tabling a measure kills it. Why, then, should there be so much talk to-day to the effect that there is not to be a square vote on this proposition?

There is a large group in this House, as developed by the speeches to-day, which seems to think it is unfair and almost dishonorable for anyone to insist that the issue be joined squarely, as it will be joined, upon the McLemore resolution, and upon nothing else. But the question before the country to-day is the McLemore resolution. There can be no doubt whatever about that. From the moment leading Members went at the request of the President to the White House and told him, and told the newspapers afterwards, that, in their judgment, the McLemore resolution would pass two or three to one, the issue became the McLemore resolution. It can not be anything else to-day. That report—whether true or not, of course I do not know—went throughout the broad land of the United States and went across the ocean to the German capital. Many of you are familiar with the text of the article in the Vossische Zeitung [Berlin], which dealt with that statement by certain of the majority leaders of this House. I quote briefly from the article:

It is not without risk—

Speaking of the armed merchantman issue—

It is not without risk, but the risk, perhaps, is smaller since the American Congress shows signs of demanding that the decision in international affairs be taken from the President's hands and placed in those of Congress.

The question of whether we are going to uphold the hands of the President in his diplomatic negotiations with Germany thereupon became the McLemore resolution, and the vote upon that resolution to-day is a square vote of upholding or a square vote of not upholding, as the case may be. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Forty-nine minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS].

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, the situation presented here to-day is not of our choosing, but it is here and we must meet it in a patriotic manner.

The framers of the Constitution were wise and farsighted in the establishment of our Government when they provided for three separate branches—the legislative, executive, and judicial. That document gives the President the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and to nominate and appoint ambassadors and other public ministers, and also the right to receive ambassadors and other public ministers. Under these powers is invested in him the right of initiation and control of our diplomatic negotiations with other countries, and whenever he comes to an agreement or conclusion he can report treaties to the Senate for ratification; he can give information at any time to Congress on the state of the Union. The attempt on the part of Congress to pass any resolution upon the present subject matter of diplomatic negotiations in the course of negotiation is clearly an interference and an infringement of the constitutional prerogative of the Executive and fraught with great danger to our country. What a spectacle we would present to the world if the Congress of the United States, composed of two bodies, one with nearly 100 Members and this with 435, oftentimes in disagreement, if it should take out of the hands of the Executive the handling of diplomatic and foreign relations.

The President, in his letter to Mr. POU, states that a report is being circulated in foreign capitals and being made industrious use of that there are divided counsels in Congress in regard to the foreign policy of this Government, and that while he believes the report to be false, yet so long as it is in any way credited it can not fail to do the greatest harm and expose the country to the most serious risks. We all of us must realize that such a condition of affairs necessarily weakens the voice of the President and cripples and paralyzes his hand. There ought to be no question as to the duty of the American Congress in a time like this. [Applause.]

The Constitution further provides that the laws shall be faithfully executed, and that "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." In pursuance of his constitutional duty the President is enforcing the supreme law of the land and has demanded in his negotiations with belligerent countries that the rights of American citizens and American commerce on the high seas shall be upheld in accordance with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the accepted principles of international law, and the recognized usages of nations. The President's note of May 13, 1915, stated that—

American citizens act within their indisputable rights in taking their ships and in traveling wherever their legitimate business calls them upon the high seas and exercise those rights in what should be the well-justified confidence that their lives will not be endangered by acts done in clear violation of universally acknowledged international obligations, and certainly in the confidence that their own Government will sustain them in the exercise of their rights.

We may doubt the wisdom of their traveling on armed merchantmen, and we individually may warn our friends against it, but for our Government, in its official capacity, to give a warning is another and more serious question, and would be considered a surrender and a yielding up of those rights which have been established by our courts and long since recognized by all the nations. [Applause.]

The submarine is a new type of war vessel. We have them in our Navy. They are in all navies; but for one, my mind revolts at the suggestion that the settled principles of international law should be modified to suit the conditions and conveniences of every new demon of warfare, either in the sea below or in the sky above, in order that it may pursue more effectually its murderous way. [Applause.] Such a position, in my judgment, means a backward step in the development of international law. It means going back to the Dark Ages and to barbarism. If the course of international law is to be changed, I want to see it take the pathway of civilization, humanity, and the progress of the world to the higher headlands of righteousness and justice. [Applause.]

The American people are not for war. They are for peace with all nations, but not for peace at any price. They believe in the freedom of the seas and the right of American citizens to travel on the high seas, which they are justly entitled to, and to these they will hold fast; and if we do not stand for our rights for which our fathers so dearly fought we are unworthy of them. I can not yield to the unpatriotic suggestion that comes from some quarters that we ought to refrain from insisting upon our position, because forsooth of its effect upon one side or the other of the belligerents. Our duty is to stand for what we believe to be right under the accepted principles of international law, and to use a homely expression, "Let the chips fall where they will." [Applause.] We have taken our position upon the high plane of neutrality, and we insist upon our rights as neutrals and nothing more.

Our duty is clear. At the water's edge all politics cease. This is no question of party politics. It rises higher than that. It is a question of American statesmanship, and let us meet it like men "who know their rights and knowing dare maintain." [Applause.]

When the war clouds which are to-day enveloping all Europe shall have passed away, when the last shot shall have been fired, when the trenches shall have given up their dead, and when the mighty armies shall have gone back to the useful pursuits of life, under, I trust, an everlasting peace, then the nations which are now at war, violating the principles of international law which they once held dear, will gaze in grateful appreciation across the sea to that spirit of America, white robed and holding aloft the law of nations as she tells them, "I have held it sacred as between you all, I have held it for you to this brighter day, and I have held it for all mankind and for the coming of international peace, which must rest on international justice."

I appeal to you by all the ties that bind us to a common country that our voice may ring out clear and strong on this day, so that it can be heard around the world, and would that its refrain might be caught up by the American people everywhere, on the hillsides of the North, on the prairies of the West, and on the savannahs of the South, that as American citizens we stand united one and all for our country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield me a few minutes more?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I regret my time has been taken up.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, before I begin to make the few remarks here in the five minutes that have been allotted to me by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to serve notice now, Mr. Speaker, that there will be no further extension of remarks in the RECORD by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will stick to it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will stick to it all right. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in rather a peculiar position this afternoon in addressing the House in the very few minutes that have been allotted to me to talk about this great question that is before the American Congress. I can not say what is really in my mind and what I want to say in the five minutes that have been allotted to me.

I regret very much that the question has not come before the Congress squarely and fairly, so that the Members of this House could be put upon record and be permitted to express their honest convictions on the plain and simple proposition as to whether or not foolhardy and madcap or financial American citizens ought to travel on belligerent ships, armed, at this time of peril in our country's history. I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to vote this morning against the previous question on the rule, but when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] took the floor and said it was the purpose of the minority to offer this resolution to strike out both the preamble and the resolution and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives citizens of the United States under existing conditions and irrespective of their legal rights ought to refrain from taking passage on armed vessels of belligerent nations except in case of imperative necessity.

And on the consideration of the resolution and amendments thereto the House should proceed under the five-minute rule to a final vote or passage I found myself an orphan and unable to vote for that resolution, because it meant if we refused to adopt the previous question we were compelled to vote for this resolution submitted by the gentleman from Illinois.

I can not vote for this substitute for the reason that it would permit those citizens of this country who have sold arms and ammunition to any of the belligerents to travel in safety on armed ships, while it would warn off those of our citizens who are engaged in agriculture or productive occupations.

Now, if it were left to me, my record is made. I voted in the Committee on Foreign Affairs to substitute, first, the Shackleford resolution, which is well known to the membership of this House, and which requests all citizens to refrain from taking passage on armed merchant ships in this time of peril, and when that was voted down I voted to substitute the Senate provision, which negatively warns them from taking such passage, so that the Members of the House, if they could not be put upon positive vote as to whether or not American citizens should travel upon armed belligerent vessels, they ought at least to be permitted to vote negatively on the question. I submitted the provision that was submitted to the Senate, and when that was voted down I was left an orphan; and when we come in here to-day we find ourselves without the opportunity to express our opinion as to whether or not a foolhardy or any other fanatical citizen of the United States for financial reasons should be permitted to engage 100,000,000 people of the United States in war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MCLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, as the author of the resolution, I wish to use a portion of the time allotted to me in expressing my gratitude to the gentleman who has the time in charge for this recognition. I could not say anything at all in two minutes, and I can do nothing more than to thank him for what he has done for me. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I will take advantage of the privilege given by the House and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. [Laughter.] I thought the gentleman from Oklahoma was going to relieve me of that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will not do it to-day, but I assure the gentleman I will do it hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I deeply deplore the necessity which compels me to differ with the President and to vote against the motion to table the McLemore resolution, but I will not become a partner in any proceeding to plunge this country of 100,000,000 of human beings into the European inferno of slaughter and then seek to justify my treachery to America upon the flimsy pretext of party loyalty. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY].

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, I believe that nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand people in the United States earnestly desire peace. Of all the men in this peace-loving Republic, I believe there is not one to whom war is more repugnant than to Woodrow Wilson. As proof of this we have only to point to the history of the last 18 months. How many Members of this House would advise running up the white flag as a means of insuring peace? Did you ever see an effort to keep out of a fight succeed by showing the white feather? Any schoolboy will tell you if you make a cowardly backdown and surrender of your rights one day, every coward in school will pick a fuss with you the next day just for the fun of seeing you run.

Voting to table this resolution will not make for war, but for peace.

From the time of the inauguration of Washington our diplomatic negotiations have been conducted by the President. It is fortunate for the country that this is so. Is there one here who has listened to the discussions by the members of the various boards of strategy that assemble daily in the cloakrooms of the House and Senate who believes the handling of this job in these parlous times should be turned over to Congress? God deliver our country from such a fate. The delicate and difficult task of preserving peace with honor which our President is now laboring to perform will, in my judgment, be rendered very difficult, if not impossible, should this effort to hog tie him be successful. I shall never vote to declare a war in which I shall not at the same time stand ready to enlist. [Applause.]

I have had many letters and telegrams from men in my district, whose friendship I prize, urging me to support this resolution. I believe these men are honest in their convictions and that they are patriotic Americans. If they could foresee the result of our interference with the President as it appears to me, I am sure they would urge me just as strongly against doing what they now ask me to do.

There is no profit in being a Member of this House other than the distinction of honorably serving the people of this Nation. If it becomes necessary to surrender this emolument in order to retain the office—for me the choice is not difficult.

I have the utmost confidence in the patriotism and integrity of Woodrow Wilson. His energy and patience have been proven beyond question. In intellect and courage he stands second to no man in this Commonwealth. He is my President, and I trust him and believe he will bring us through this crisis without bloodshed and without a stain on our national honor if we will quit giving aid and comfort to his avowed enemies and his misguided friends, and as loyal, honest American citizens give him that support to which he is entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are two classes of Members who have spoken in favor of a warning resolution. There is that class who believe it desirable to express the sentiment of the Congress that men should not travel upon belligerent ships, because of the risk that might come of involving the country in war, and who would stop there. There is another class, who believe that that warning ought to be issued either with the express declaration or the tacit understanding that if the warning is disregarded America does not propose in any way to uphold the rights of her nationals to so travel. Now, these men in some instances have considered what underlies this proposition, and some of them have ignored it and sought to confine the whole issue simply to that proposal. For my own part I do not believe it possible now to issue a warning so worded that it will not convey necessarily the impression, not in America, but to those with whom we are dealing and with whom we have a controversy, that America is prepared now, if need be, to back down from the position that the President has taken touching the rights of neutrals upon belligerent merchant ships. If my time lasts I shall endeavor to state just what the issue is that is being dealt with between him and the German Empire. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], however, consciously or subconsciously, recognized that underneath this proposal was a great deal more than simply the discussion of whether an American should travel upon a belligerent armed merchantman or not, and he proceeded with all of the ability that he possesses to present the contention that Germany is presenting to-day to the United States Government in her controversy over what she proposes to do in connection with the sinking of merchant ships of belligerents.

Now, it is one thing for men to think in their own minds that people ought not to travel. It is an entirely different thing for the Congress of a great sovereignty solemnly to make such a declaration, and it could only be made intelligently with the idea that that sovereignty proposed not to stand for the rights of such nationals so to travel.

What is the situation that has grown up in the world? There has come into use a new weapon of warfare, the submarine, a weapon that is wonderfully effective in an offensive way and exceedingly fragile in a defensive way. Under the law of nations—and I care not what reference may be made to the note that this country sent, not as a statement of positive position of America, but simply as a suggestion to certain of the belligerents to see if it could be made a medium of an agreement to avoid a subsequent controversy that everyone saw was going to arise—but I repeat, the plain law as it existed when the war broke out was and that now is, a merchant ship thus engaged in the ordinary pursuit of carrying freight and passengers from port to port that is not so armed as to indicate that it will be used offensively, has the right not to be sunk without warning on the part of a warship of a hostile power, but only to be sunk when it elects, as it has the right to elect, not to surrender but to resist. Under the law as it exists it is the duty of the attacking warship to signal a merchant ship engaged in peaceable trade to stop, and if it does, it becomes the duty of the attacking warship to take that merchantman into a port as a prize, or failing in ability to do that, to provide before sinking it, for the safety of both the passengers and the crew, because not even the crew can be treated as belligerents. If the merchantman resists, then it does it at its peril and forfeits that right and may be sunk without any more warning.

Now, this is Germany's argument. She says, "I have a weapon which is very effective if it can be used with surprise, but it is very defective if it has to give warning of the attack. In order for me to successfully use it I have got to attack without warning a ship that is defensively armed, because any ship that has any armament that amounts to anything at all has sufficient armament to put out of business such submarine." And she serves notice on America, "We have no quarrel with you, but if you get in the way, if you insist upon the exercise of the right which exists under international law of having your citizens travel on such ships, we give you notice now that we propose to sink those ships without warning." Who is here to say that the President would have been justified in saying "All right"?

What is the plea made by the gentleman from Wisconsin? He says the time may come when we will cease to be a neutral and become a belligerent, and our exigency may be so great that we in turn shall turn outlaw and disregard the law of nations because it is to our advantage. I do not believe it. This country has always stood for the rights of neutral nations, and, as I said yesterday, and I repeat to-day, the time is coming in this world when belligerents will learn that they are the outlaws, that it is not for them to make the laws to the disadvantage of the peaceful people of the world, but it is for the peaceful nations of the earth to say how far these outlaws may go and how far they shall not.

Now, shall this country with this issue presented abandon its plain rights? It may be, and I think it will be, that international law when the war is over will be so modified by the consent of nations as to change the status of the merchantmen and submarines. But, gentlemen, when that change comes I, for one, hope it will come in the direction that works for humanity and for the sacredness of life rather than for sudden death and murder on the high seas. [Applause.] I, for one, am not willing that this great Nation, the only great neutral left in this world-wide war, shall voluntarily in advance surrender the rights of the neutral under the threat of any nation at any time. [Applause.]

Oh, gentlemen are wonderfully alarmed, and I marvel at the courage of men who advance the idea that the President of the United States is undertaking to bring this country ultimately into war. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past, and what has there been in the past history of the President of the United States in these trying times that would warrant the most bigoted partisan in accusing him of trying to force America into war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how many speeches has the gentleman remaining on the other side?

Mr. FLOOD. Only one more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, two minutes is rather a short time in which to discuss a question of this importance. I think we all understand what this resolution provides. On this side we did not bring it in, and now that it is brought in on that side you propose to kill it. Much has been said along these lines upon each side. So far as I am concerned, I voted against the previous question on the rule and against the rule. This matter is of that importance, and if it be of that importance that Members claim, with gentlemen differing on both sides, it seems to me that further time might be taken for discussion.

Can we further discuss it if it is not laid upon the table? Yes. Are we confined to the amendment to be offered, as notice was given, by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]? No. If we refuse to kill it by laying it on the table, it is open to the widest amendment or amendments that are germane; and so, under all the conditions and all the circumstances, the President not having appeared and addressed Congress, nor given us full information, nor sent a message to Congress—everything considered—I have made up my mind to register my vote against laying this resolution on the table; not that I am for it without amendment, but the House might well take one day, two days, three days, with freedom of amendment that is germane, to further consider this question. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, since this issue arose, now almost two weeks ago, I have endeavored to the best of my ability to learn the real issue involved. There are pending in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House several resolutions, the purport of which is to warn Americans from taking passage on certain classes of belligerent ships. That resolution which it was the pleasure of the majority of this House to present here for consideration and vote is the one that they thought by its terms, if brought here in such a way as to prohibit amendment, would be the one to command the least support, and prevent a record of the honest convictions of the membership of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] If it be the purpose of the Chief Executive of the United States to know whether or not in the judgment of Congress he is right in the position that he and his Secretary of State have taken, that Americans of right may travel upon belligerent ships armed for defense alone, I am free to state that I am with him unequivocably in that contention. From such study as I have been able to give the question, and I have given it some, I believe he is absolutely right. I believe that an American citizen, according to the precedents of our own courts, by the rulings of our Secretaries of State, by the express statutes of our Congress, by the rulings of the civilized nations of the world in general, has the right and could exercise it if he wished to avail himself of that privilege; but, Mr. Speaker, it seems there is something else involved here to-day. I notice in the language selected, no doubt with his customary care and skill, in the letter to the Committee on Rules, the President uses these significant words:

> I therefore feel justified in asking that your committee will permit me to urge an early vote upon the resolutions—

Not the McLemore resolution, not any particular one—

> upon the resolutions with regard to travel on armed merchantmen which have recently been so much talked about, in order that there may be afforded an immediate opportunity for full public discussion and action upon them.

Whatever that may mean to some, it means to me this, that the President of the United States desires to know what we think, we, the House of Representatives, upon the much-discussed question of whether or not he should warn American citizens from taking passage upon this class of boats, irrespective of their technical legal rights. The McLemore resolution is one, if it must be voted upon yes or no, that will command the intelligent support of but few men. It contains a recital that if Americans shall take passage upon such a ship, we abandon them to their fate, and they take that passage at their own risk. No one but a cowardly man, no body but a cowardly Congress would ever indorse any such proposition. [Applause.] But why should we be asked to lay it upon the table? For no purpose but one, namely, that men who here think one way may vote another. [Applause.] The recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is that we sidestep, table, this resolution, because we have no business to pass upon it, but the President has said that we have business to pass upon it, because he asks it. They tie a fire escape to their own vote. For myself, I ask none such. The President has the right to know and the country wants him to know what the country and what we think of American citizens taking passage upon a ship when taking such passage is likely to embroil us in war. You and I know what the position of the people of the Nation is in that regard. But some say that this is a question of national honor.

Mr. Speaker, to-day when I behold the Stars and Stripes grabbed by some hands, with voices shouting, "Rally 'round the flag," I wondered why the eagle, whose sweeping pinions shelter that matchless banner, did not look down and inquire, "Will somebody please introduce to me the gentleman who is here"?

It is not a question of national honor, it is a question of common sense. It may be that as a Nation we are too proud to fight, but I do not believe it; whether we are or not, however, we ought to be too high-minded to place a chip upon our shoulder and dare any nation to strike it off.

Mr. Speaker, we have sat here in silence, awed, humiliated, heart-broken silence, while our brethren have been shot and killed and outraged in Mexico, when 18 of our brethren were lined up against the wall and shot. Oh, I have sometimes thought I would rather be one of those bleeding, bullet-pierced, desecrated bodies, still and stark in death, than to be a fellow compatriot of one of them here in the silence, in the self-complacent protection of our home, too big a coward to avenge their deaths! [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have sat here in humiliated silence when American babes and American genius, without warning and without a chance for life, sank beneath the waves of the mighty sea, and to-day are enshrouded in the weeds of the Atlantic. Why, then, do the brethren come here and say that it is a question vital to American national honor?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think any Member upon this floor misunderstands the issue that we shall vote upon this afternoon. I do not care for what reason Members oppose the McLemore resolution. In every essential it is as well drawn, as good a resolution, as the one the Republican Members of the Committee on Rules brought into this House to-day. I do not care what excuses a good part of the Republican leadership may make for their partisan fight on an issue involving a great international question. The question which presents itself to this House is whether its vote will be such as to sustain the President of the United States in the diplomatic controversy he has at this time with the German Government. It undoubtedly will. The Senate has taken action that is satisfactory to the country. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I know it is not satisfactory to Republicans who would run the risk of plunging this country into war to make capital for their party, but the action the Senate has taken is satisfactory to the country. I believe the House in a few moments will take action that will be just as satisfactory to the country.

I want to thank those patriotic Republicans who, standing for what they believe to be right, have acted with us on this side and assisted us in bringing this matter before the House. [Applause.]

The law is so clear that the President could not have taken any position than the one he has.

It is a well-established principle of international law that a neutral has the right to transport his person and property upon armed merchant vessels of belligerents.

When, therefore, we give the warning provided for by this resolution, we advise our citizens to give up a right that is undoubtedly theirs; and when we notify such citizens that if they do not take this advice they travel at their own risk, we publish to the world that we will not protect our citizens in rights that are universally recognized as belonging to them.

It is also a well-established principle that merchant vessels have a right to be armed for defense, and this right has been interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases that stand unreversed and certainly bind this country. We therefore can not deny the right of merchant vessels to arm for defensive purposes.

We can not deny that Great Britain will be within the law when she permits the arming of her merchant vessels.

It is also a well-established principle of international law that no belligerent nation is under any obligation to consent to a change of that law during the continuance of the war. It follows, therefore, that we can do no more than suggest a change in this rule, and if Great Britain declines that suggestion the law remains unchanged. We have made the suggestion and Great Britain has not accepted it. This is what the note of January 18, 1916, was, and that is all it was.

The claim of the right to arm merchant vessels is not the result of a sudden decision on the part of England in order to protect her merchant vessels from capture, but has been for centuries the practice and law of nations. Until this controversy arose this right was not questioned by any nation.

It is just as well established by the law of nations that while the outbreak of the war authorizes a belligerent to capture the private property of his enemy, it does not operate as a confiscation of the property, and that a merchant vessel shall not be sunk or destroyed without first putting in a place of safety the persons on board and, if possible, the property.

The defensive weakness of submarines prevents them from complying with this principle, and the German Government wishes to abrogate this humane rule by an ex parte announcement.

Our Government is unwilling for this and is insisting that the law shall be observed. We recognize that there is strong reasoning in the suggestions of Germany, but Great Britain has also suggested modifications in the law in reference to blockade which are based upon sound reason, and if we yield in one case we would be compelled to yield to the other until, as was said by the President, "the whole fine fabric of international law would crumble under our hands piece by piece."

To warn our citizens not to travel on armed merchant vessels would be to acknowledge Germany's right to destroy these vessels without warning and without provision for the safety of those on board.

It would be an acquiescence in the system which planned and carried out the destruction of the Lusitania without regard to the lives or safety of the noncombatants, consisting of innocent men, women, and children on board, an act which the President denounced with such dignity, clearness, and force as to challenge the admiration of the world and awaken anew a respect for the precepts of international law and the instincts of humanity.

If we passed the warning resolution, we would have to yield point after point, until amid the savagery and recklessness which has been engendered by this unprecedented strife in Europe respect for international law will be wholly lost and the principles of that body of law, whose existence and development has been one of the crowning glories of our civilization, will crumble and perish and we will have no chart or compass to guide our course. The only safe course is to stand up strongly for the law. This is the course which the President has pursued, and in doing so he has performed a service to the world and to humanity, and even to the belligerent nations, who, when the passions of this war have subsided, will recognize that their own essential rights and interests have been preserved by his action, and will turn to this country as the mediator of their differences. [Applause.]

The President is embarrassed and thwarted in his negotiations with Germany because that Government has gained the impression that Congress is not in accord with the Executive. The Senate has acted. Let us lay this resolution on the table and, together with the other branch of Congress, disabuse the minds of the leaders of this foreign Government of its erroneous impression.

Gentlemen talk of keeping this country out of war, as if there was danger of war if this resolution is laid on the table. This is a mere excuse for the vote they will cast. We can trust the President. He has kept us out of war so far. He will not by any act of his plunge this country into bloodshed unless the very honor of the Nation demands it. His whole course has shown that he will not lightly take any action that would permit or cause Congress to turn loose the mighty forces which this country could put into the European conflict.

Through the periscope of a submarine an armed ship can not be distinguished from an unarmed ship, and owing to defensive weakness of the undersea craft they will not take the risk of getting near enough to a merchant vessel to ascertain whether it is armed or not; it is doubtful if they will get near enough to determine whether the merchant ship is belligerent or neutral. The danger, therefore, would be almost as great on one class of merchant vessels as on another. The great danger to the lives of American citizens and, therefore, the great danger of involving this country in war would arise from the right the German Government would assume if we passed a warning resolution to take down the bars and order its submarines to fire on any class of merchant vessels without providing for the safety of those on board. It would not be long before the lives of some of our citizens would be destroyed and under circumstances that could not be justified, and we would be face to face with this very trouble those in favor of a warning resolution have tried to avoid.

Under the Constitution the conduct of diplomatic negotiations is one of the prerogatives of the President; under the unbroken precedents and practice in this country our Chief Executive has been allowed to carry on negotiations, without interference from any other branch of the Government. But the question presented to us is broader and deeper than constitutional prerogative or precedent. It is a question of whether this House is standing with its Government or a foreign Government. I have no doubt about what the House of Representatives will do. Let us do it by an overwhelming majority. Let us uphold the hands of the President and the Government. Let us be for our country, because it stands in the light while other nations are groping in the dark, because it stands for law, because it stands for principles and ideals that will prevail, and because it is our country. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that House resolution 147 be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to lay House resolution No. 147 on the table.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 276, nays 142, answered "present" 1, not voting 15, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. CLARK of Florida (for) with Mr. CHIPERFIELD (against).

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado (for) with Mr. HILLIARD (against).

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if my pair shows that I am in favor of the motion, and my colleague [Mr. HILLIARD] is against the motion?

The SPEAKER. It does.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWN of West Virginia, for an indefinite time, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LOFT, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. CLARK of Florida, on request of Mr. SEARS, indefinitely, on account of business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 8, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an item of legislation for incorporation in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the service of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 839); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War ad interim, transmitting estimates of appropriations for reimbursement of certain officers of the Army for miscellaneous expenses incurred while on special duty (H. Doc. No. 840); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations to be incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation bill for continuation of public buildings, alterations, and repairs (H. Doc. No. 841); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tentative draft of legislation in relation to the immigration station at Philadelphia, Pa. (H. Doc. No. 842); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Chief Clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Samuel Willard Mann v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 843); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. TIMBERLAKE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8654) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 305), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 171) to continue in effect the provisions of the act of March 9, 1906, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 306), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DILLON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11320) granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Twin Falls and Minidoka, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 307), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. ADAIR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, etc., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 308), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 12835) to authorize and empower officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps to serve under the Government of the Republic of Haiti, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. LEVER: A bill (H. R. 12836) to empower certain officers, agents, and employees of the Department of Agriculture to administer and take oaths, affirmations, and affidavits, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. STEENERSON: A bill (H. R. 12837) to provide for the establishment and administration of a forest reserve and for the sale of timber within the Red Lake Indian Reservation in Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FOCHT: A bill (H. R. 12838) to provide for the removal of the body of the late Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock from Norristown, Pa., to the National Cemetery, Arlington, Va., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. PARK: A bill (H. R. 12839) to refund amount paid illegally for cotton tax, to be used in pensioning Confederate soldiers and widows of Confederate soldiers; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12840) to make it unlawful to appoint as commissioned or noncommissioned officers in the Army or Navy of the United States any person of the negro race; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WICKERSHAM: A bill (H. R. 12841) to appropriate $750,000 for further construction and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TILSON: A bill (H. R. 12842) to provide for special appliances necessary for the immediate manufacture of arms, ammunition, and equipment in time of war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 12844) to provide cumulative sick leave with pay to storekeepers, gaugers, and storekeeper-gaugers; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

By Mr. HARRISON: Resolution (H. Res. 160) to provide for the consideration of H. R. 12766; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAIR: A bill (H. R. 12843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; to the Committee of the Whole House.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, March 3, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are very few Senators in the Chamber, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Norris	Smoot
Catron	James	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Pittman	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Robinson	Wadsworth
Culberson	McCumber	Sheppard
Curtis	Myers	Shields
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-nine Sentors have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees to attend. [After a pause.] Several Senators have come in since the roll call. The Secretary will now call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. COLT, Mr. FALL, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. HUSTING, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. REED, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call discloses the absence of a quorum. The Sergeant at Arms will renew the notification to absent Senators.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], being a comprehensive amendment with many sections, known as the Newlands waterways proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have here an article by Charles W. Comstock, formerly State engineer of the State of Colorado. It is not a long one. I should like to have it published as a Senate document. It gives various statistics concerning water power.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Colorado allow it to go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Colorado will be granted, with such modification as was made by the Senator from Utah. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 22, at the end of the amendment heretofore agreed to, add the following additional sections:

SEC. 15. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission consisting of seven men, at least four of whom shall be skilled engineers of high repute, which commission shall be known as the national waterways commission.

SEC. 16. That it shall be the duty of said commission to make thorough investigation and inquiry concerning all the practicable means and improvements which may be employed to prevent the loss of property and of life from the flood waters or overflow of the navigable inland streams and waterways of the United States. Such inquiry shall relate—

First. To the sufficiency of existing levees, dikes, embankments, dams, and all other improvements used for protection against such overflow, whether the same have been constructed by a State or by the National Government, and if any such be found insufficient, a determination by said commission of the additions thereto or supervision thereof necessary to furnish adequate protection against such overflow.

Second. Such inquiry shall further relate to the practicability of storing a portion of the waters of any of said streams or their tributaries by means of reservoirs or dams at or near the headwaters or sources thereof, or of diverting the waters of such streams or their tributaries above a particular level into other natural or artificial channels or waterways, thus preventing such accumulation as will result in overflow; and it shall also be the duty of said commission to ascertain to what extent waters stored or diverted as aforesaid may by reason of the proximity of irrigable land be available for irrigation or for the reclamation of arid or semiarid lands, and to ascertain also the extent to which waters stored or diverted may be utilized for power purposes.

Third. Said commission shall also ascertain, as nearly as may be, the losses to agricultural and forest lands caused by the washing away or erosion and submergence of the banks and consequent widening of any of said streams, and shall make thorough investigation as to the means or improvements best adapted to control and regulate the current of such streams, thus preventing the destruction of said lands.

SEC. 17. That in order that said commission may make just estimate of the need, practicability, and probable cost of any improvement of said streams and waterways herein contemplated, it is hereby authorized to make or cause to be made all necessary preliminary surveys, drafts, and plans, and for the purpose of facilitating its work of investigation and survey said commission is authorized to invite and, if possible, secure the cooperation of the several States, counties, or municipalities the lands and property within the boundaries of which may be subject to damage because of the overflow or washing of the streams herein mentioned or which may be benefited by the use for irrigation or domestic purposes of the waters stored or diverted in the manner hereinbefore mentioned In the prosecution of said work and in making report thereon said commission is authorized to avail itself of all prior surveys and estimates and of existing reliable data in regard to any of the subjects of investigation herein authorized.

SEC. 18. That said commission is hereby authorized and directed to report from time to time to the President of the United States concerning the need, practicability, present exigency, and probable cost of any specific improvement herein contemplated and to make full and complete report of all proceedings hereunder and of the results of the investigations provided for herein, together with such recommendations as may by said commission be deemed advisable, to the President and the Congress of the United States on or before the 1st day of January, 1918.

SEC. 19. That the members of said commission shall be paid a salary at the rate of $7,500 per annum and in addition thereto their necessary expenses incurred in the prosecution of said work, and they are hereby authorized to employ such manual, clerical, and expert assistance as shall be necessary: Provided, That the expenditure under this bill shall not, in the payment of salaries and all other expenses, exceed the sum of $200,000.

SEC. 20. That the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the salaries and meet the expenses of the said commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have held this amendment in reserve until the text of the bill was perfected or improved, it being an addition to the bill rather than an amendment to any part of the bill as it stands.

A word or two in regard to the history of this amendment. In April, 1913, being somewhat moved by the destruction caused by the Ohio floods, I introduced Senate joint resolution No. 25. This proposed amendment is the same as that joint resolution, except the necessary change in the date on which the commission should make its general report to Congress.

There is this further change, Mr. President, from the original joint resolution; and let me say in passing that I should like to have the attention of Senators to the provisions of this amendment, if I may, because I deem it exceedingly important, and I believe that it is entitled to the earnest consideration of Senators.

There is this in addition to the original joint resolution: I provide that—

In the prosecution of said work and in making report thereon said commission is authorized to avail itself of all prior surveys and estimates and of existing reliable data in regard to any of the subjects of investigation herein authorized.

Primarily the amendment is for the purpose of flood prevention. The commission is authorized to make inquiry first into the "sufficiency of existing levees, dikes, embankments, dams, and all other improvements used for protection against such overflow, whether the same have been constructed by a State or by the National Government; and if any such be found insufficient, a determination by said commission of the additions thereto or supervision thereof necessary to furnish adequate protection against such overflow."

The amendment further covers, Mr. President, the related subjects of irrigation, of the use of water impounded in reservoirs or otherwise for purposes of irrigation or for purpose of the development of water power. It contemplates a study of this further question, a most serious and important one in certain sections of the country; that is, the question of bank erosion and the submergence of the banks in the streams and the loss and destruction of valuable farm and forest lands caused by such erosion.

This amendment, Mr. President, does not propose, as does the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], an expenditure of $60,000,000 a year, or a total of $600,000,000 in 10 years, distributed throughout various sections of the United States; but it proposes, in the first place, a commission of inquiry to investigate in a comprehensive way this great question of flood prevention and the incidental questions of irrigation, water power, and bank erosion, and the expenditure under the amendment is limited to $200,000.

As I have said, Mr. President, I was moved to introduce the resolution, in the first place, back in 1913, because of the damage caused by the Ohio flood. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Other business, of course, intervened. It was an important session, and I suppose but little consideration, if any, was given to this important resolution. There was great public interest in the question at that time and for some months after the great destruction caused by the Ohio flood; but as July came on, the dry season of the year, the interest in the question seemed to subside just as the flood had subsided.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that in view of the frequent recurrence of these floods, in view, too, of the good that may come to the country and to great sections of the country by reason of the impounding of the waters and their use for irrigation or their use in the development of power, this amendment is now a most important and timely amendment to this bill.

I grant, Mr. President, that it has not, as the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska had not, received the consideration of the committee to which it had been referred, but there is no need to refer to a committee the question of appointing this commission. Every great river flood we have had in this country is an object lesson more convincing than the testimony of all the experts in the country as to the need of a commission to do this preliminary work of making surveys and estimates and reporting, first, to the President in regard to the early need of any specific improvement and, second, reporting to Congress in regard to any comprehensive plan of improvement; and that is what is proposed by the amendment.

We have some recent examples of losses by floods in southern California, in Oklahoma, in the White River in Arkansas, the great loss from the breaking of the levee in the Mississippi at Hickman, Ky., where, it is said, a thousand people were rendered homeless, a flood occurring, I think, not longer ago than January. In the floods of this year already, in southern California, in the San Luis Rey and San Pasqual Valleys, nearly 100 lives were lost.

I merely want to call attention briefly to the figures furnished by the Geological Survey in regard to losses sustained by floods in Ohio in 1913. I say the floods in Ohio, but they are more properly known as the Ohio Valley floods, not having been confined by any means to the State of Ohio. In the States of Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and West Virginia the estimated aggregate loss of private property caused by those floods is the enormous sum of $180,873,097. Besides, the losses to municipalities, because of loss of municipal improvements and county improvements, aggregated the tremendous sum of $10,662,183. Quoting from the report:

A discussion of flood losses in general follows. That the actual losses resulting from the flood of March-April, 1913, will greatly exceed $200,000,000 there seems to be little doubt. However, any estimate of the total amount of damage, considering all phases, would, especially at this time, be simply a guess.

That is to say, that the losses will reach that tremendous figure in any event—$200,000,000—and then that there are losses that may be said to be of a nature incalculable outside of these direct and tangible losses. In addition to the property loss there was the more grievous loss of human life. Over four hundred lives were lost as a direct result of the Ohio floods, to say nothing of the sickness and deaths caused by insanitary conditions following the flood.

We had a Waterways Commission which made a report in 1912; but, Mr. President, the work of that commission, as contradistinguished from the work of the commission proposed by this amendment, is this: Their work, while very valuable, was largely academic; it referred, of course, to other reports and data. It was not a commission to do the work of surveying and to do the work of making estimates of the cost of this or that particular project or improvement. There is one significant paragraph in that report, which shows and illustrates the need of a commission such as my amendment provides for. On page 27 of the report is found this paragraph:

The lack of adequate information makes it impossible for the commission to specify on what streams the construction of reservoirs would result in benefits commensurate with the cost.

Now, note this:

In most cases little is known concerning stream flow and the physical conditions causing floods, or whether there exist reservoir sites suitable to afford the necessary relief.

And the very intent and purpose of this amendment is to furnish information "concerning stream flow and the physical conditions causing floods, or whether there exist reservoir sites suitable to afford the necessary relief." Reading a little further:

The extent of damages caused by floods on different streams has not, as a rule, been accurately determined, nor have investigations been made to ascertain the relation of the cost to the benefits that would be derived from the construction of reservoir systems. The commission is of the opinion that each case must be considered on its merits, after a thorough investigation of all the facts, and strongly urges the necessity of careful studies such as the one recently made by the Pittsburgh Flood Commission.

I have little more to say, Mr. President, in regard to this proposed amendment. The bill is complete, I grant, without the amendment, and yet the amendment is germane to the bill, for the regulation by reservoirs or by diversion, of the waters of navigable streams or the tributaries of those navigable streams, thus preventing overflows, has a relation, of course, to the regular and general flow in the navigable streams; and that has its relation to dams and water power throughout the year. Hence, on that account it is a proper amendment to this bill; but, then, there is the other great consideration, and I can not help but think, Mr. President, in view of the tremendous destruction caused by floods and in view of what is likely to happen, that Congress is neglecting a serious duty in not making provision to prevent these great losses, and at the same time making provision for the utilization of the waters that are impounded or diverted for the purposes of irrigation and for water power.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I understand that the Senator's amendment, or practically the same amendment, was before the Senate some years ago with reference to another bill, was it not?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know as to that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Well, did not the Senator offer substantially this amendment to a bill a couple of years ago?

Mr. STERLING. No; I offered it as a Senate joint resolution.

Mr. KENYON. And what action was taken upon it?

Mr. STERLING. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and, so far as I know, no further action was taken upon it.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if there was any discussion at the time, and, if so, what the argument was against a proposition of this character?

Mr. STERLING. I heard of no discussion nor of any argument against it.

Mr. KENYON. What is the objection now to placing it on this bill?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know of a single objection, I will say to the Senator; indeed, I talked to many Senators at the time I introduced it as a joint resolution and they all approved of it. I remember speaking to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and to the then senior Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, in regard to it. I also spoke to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] in regard to it, and to a number of other Senators with whom I had become acquainted at that time, and they approved of the principle of the resolution.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to be a proposition of such importance that I wish the Senator might have a hearing upon it and a consideration for it, but I assume he can not get it.

Mr. STERLING. I hardly see why, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, I can not have serious and thorough consideration of this amendment now. Let me say, Mr. President, that we have devoted over four long weeks to the discussion of this bill and to the amendments offered to it. Can we not give a day, if it is required, to the discussion of an important proposition like this?

I want to refer to one matter in which I am immediately interested, though that is not the prime motive at all for introducing the amendment. I refer to the question of bank erosion, which is one of the subjects contemplated by the amendment; and I feel the more free to do so because the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] yesterday went into the question of damages done by reason of the breaking of the levees on the Mississippi River, and the great work and the great expenditure that will be required to put the lower Mississippi in a safe condition.

We are great sufferers in South Dakota, and right at my home city, from bank erosion of the Missouri River. Let me tell you what I have tried to do. Despairing of any relief through a river and harbor bill or anything that might be reported by the Committee on Commerce, I introduced here early in this session an emergency joint resolution providing for an appropriation of $100,000 to prevent the washing away of the most valuable farm lands in South Dakota, lands that would be worth from $150 to $200 an acre but for the menace of the Missouri River in Clay County and other counties in South Dakota along that river.

What was done with it? It was referred to the Committee on Commerce; referred by the Committee on Commerce to the Secretary of War; referred by the Secretary of War to the Board of Army Engineers; and, at the kind instance of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, I visited the Board of Army Engineers. They had received the bill a few days before. It was on a Monday that I was there—three weeks ago last Monday—and I was promised a report on the following Wednesday. That report has not yet been made, although I submitted with my request for an early report the affidavits of citizens of Vermilion, the affidavits of farmers living in the valley near the river, and a well-prepared plat, showing the surveys made recently, which surveys showed the inroads made by the river.

Let me give you briefly an account of the damage wrought. In 1881 there was what was called the great flood. Prior to that the Missouri came in near the station on the bottom lands at the city of Vermilion; but when the flood, which was caused by an ice gorge, had subsided the channel of the Vermilion River was 3½ miles away. Now, the river is coming back to its old channel; and the affidavits which I produced before the Board of Army Engineers showed that the water was now within 300 feet of the old channel of the Missouri River, threatening, as it will and as it does, the elevators, the railroads, and the station there, threatening the destruction of many residences yet left on the bottom lands there, and still no report, and still the necessity for some measure of relief.

So, Mr. President, when we consider what this amendment contemplates in the way of the prevention of floods and in the way of study, inquiry, and investigation into these other problems connected with the overflow of our navigable streams and their tributaries, there can hardly be anything more important before the Senate now. It does not pretend, of course, to appropriate money for the improvements, but it does provide for a commission to investigate what specific improvements are now needed in regard to preventing river overflow; and it provides, as I have said, for a report to the President in regard to the need for any specific improvement and for a report to Congress of what may be needed under the general system provided for.

An appropriation of $200,000 only is asked. I doubt if that will be sufficient; but a report can be made and another Congress can and I believe will gladly make further appropriations for this need.

I had hoped that the chairman of the committee, the Senator having this bill in charge, would be inclined, in view of the importance of this amendment, in view of what it means to the country, and in view of the doubt which I think exists in regard to having a separate bill go through the Congress at this session, to accept this amendment to his bill. It interferes in no way with the operations of the system for which the bill makes provision. Indeed, as I said in substance, it is quite germane to his bill in that the work that will follow the work of the commission will have to do with the regulation of the flow of the water in our navigable streams.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the committee can not agree with the Senator presenting this amendment that it is germane to the pending bill. It creates a national waterways commission composed of seven members, at salaries of $7,500 each, and appropriates $200,000 to pay their salaries and expenses, and has provisions which make it a miniature of the amendment presented by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and rejected only a few minutes ago.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator characterizes this as a miniature of the bill or amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada. Let me say that it is a miniature only in that it makes provision for what will have to be done necessarily under the bill proposed by the Senator from Nevada. It provides for the necessary surveys and estimates. In that sense only can it be said to be a miniature of that bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill pending before the Senate concerns navigation and the development of water power. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota relates to the storage of waters in case of floods, to irrigation, to reclamation, to forestry, and to flood control generally. It takes in, as does the bill of the Senator from Nevada, almost everything that is known in any way connected with waters, and certainly is very foreign to the special subjects of legislation in the bill under consideration. The committee hopes that the Senate will not embarrass and confuse that bill with a measure of this kind, and that it will be rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is serving the cause of a broad and comprehensive treatment of all the waterways of the country by the amendment which he has proposed and by his able discussion of it. His contribution to this debate indicates the national importance of the waterway question, for it demonstrates that South Dakota has serious problems that relate to water, just as Louisiana and Mississippi have, and that in national legislation her needs and requirements should be considered as well as those of the lower reaches of the Mississippi River.

I can see no objection to the phraseology of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota or its purpose. On the contrary, I think it is a very clear statement of certain requirements which should be met. The objection I have to it is that it calls for investigations, whilst for years the country has been demanding action, work, not simply inquiry.

The work of investigation and inquiry has been going on for years. We have had two waterway commissions, both of which made long and exhaustive reports—one a commission called the Inland Waterway Commission, appointed by President Roosevelt, and the other a congressional commission appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, composed of Senators and Congressmen, bearing, by the way, the very name, the National Waterway Commission, which the Senator from South Dakota proposes to give to the commission which he has in view.

Those two commissions differed in character so far as their original authority was concerned. Mr. Roosevelt, without the action of Congress, appointed the Inland Waterway Commission, consisting of two Senators, two Representatives, and the chiefs of the scientific services of the Government that relate to the regulation or investigation of our water resources, such as the Engineer Corps of the Army, the Reclamation Service, the Forestry Service, the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Corporations, and other chiefs of scientific services. The power under which he exercised that authority was the power of recommendation to Congress reposed by the Constitution in the President, and his right to secure information with a view to making such recommendation.

Mr. Roosevelt had been impressed for a long period of time, ever since the irrigation agitation arose, with the necessity of broadly and comprehensively treating the water question; and, desirous of securing definite information upon the subject, he appointed this commission, consisting not only of Members of the Senate and of the House but of scientific experts, with a view to gathering and collating all the information upon the subject and making their recommendations. That commission, of which Senator Burton was the chairman and Senators BANKHEAD, Warner, and myself were members, not only made a reconnoissance of the waterways but had extended hearings and made their recommendations. Those recommendations cover every feature of the bill which I have been urging and which I had previously introduced, except the one as to the amount of the fund that was to be created. Mr. Burton differed with us regarding that, but he agreed with us finally as to every other feature of the work which should be undertaken by the National Government.

Later on, apparently, when we were pressing legislation and action under the recommendation made by Mr. Roosevelt following the report of that commission—a recommendation which he urgently pushed in messages and through personal influence and letters to Senators and Congressmen—another commission was devised as a means, I believe, of shunting action regarding the recommendations of the previous Inland Waterway Commission and securing delay regarding this important matter. That commission consisted of five Senators, I think, and five Representatives, and Senator Burton was also its chairman. That commission covered substantially the same ground that was covered by the previous Inland Waterway Commission, perhaps extending it in some directions, and made recommendations substantially upon the same lines, but not so specific and decisive. It was more scholarly than decisive or constructive.

It will be observed, therefore, that although this movement for investigation was inaugurated in 1907 and has been steadily pursued by the Inland Waterway Commission, which made an exhaustive report comprising numerous volumes, covering perhaps a thousand pages, and although that investigation proceeded later on under the direction of the National Waterways Commission, and it made an exhaustive report covering a number of pages, the consciousness of the Congress of the importance of this great question was not, apparently, aroused. So I insist that the time has gone by for mere investigation; that investigation simply operates to produce delay; and that it is essential that the Congress of the United States should force action which will embrace not only the organization the Senator from South Dakota contemplates, not only surveys but actual work—actual work upon projects upon which reports have already been made by the engineers and with reference to which work can be easily commenced and investigation and surveys with a view to enlarging the sphere of operations and gradually bringing out project after project, which will gradually embrace the larger scope, and work and investigation in every watershed of the country, so that the people of every watershed will feel that the action of Congress and of the administrative department of the Government is not partial or based upon favoritism, but that it applies equally and contemporaneously to every section of the country.

Whilst I regret to say that I was unable to continue my remarks of yesterday at the time to-day to which a recess was taken, because I did not understand that the Senate had recessed until 11 o'clock to-day in the place of the usual hour of 12, and I am given to understand that my amendment was disposed of during my absence without a record vote—I wish to say that my purpose in presenting the amendment has been mainly to develop information and discussion upon this important subject, with a view to action in the future rather than the present. I had hoped, however, that as this debate continued the Senate would come to the consciousness that it might be a wise thing to add to this measure the entire scheme of legislation embraced in my bill, and I was exceedingly gratified to observe, as a step in that direction, that the Senate in its record vote of yesterday upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] as to the inauguration of the approved project for water-power development at Great Falls, had so advanced in the idea of the necessity of fuller and more comprehensive action that that amendment lacked success by only two votes.

I believe that if this debate could be continued for a week or two longer, and such highly educational and instructive speeches should be made with reference to the wants of the different communities, as have been made by the Senator from South Dakota and by others, we would awaken to a realization of the fact that we are delaying most necessary work; that we have now the information necessary for action, and that now is the time for action, and that if we fail to avail ourselves of the present opportunity we will find that the pressure of legislation regarding military and naval matters, regarding the appropriation bills, and numerous other questions that are coming up, will absolutely foreclose any serious consideration of this question at the present session.

Now, as to the urgent necessity of this legislation, I was calling attention when the Senate took a recess last night to our platform declarations and insisting that the Democratic Party had given a pledge to the people which it ought to perform before the next election, and which it is under obligation to perform, and that hence the matter is urgent, because it involves in the highest degree responsibility for pledges made to the people, pledges upon which we won power.

Now, what did the Democracy declare in the platform of 1912 on this subject? Here are the words:

We renew the declaration in our last platform—

Now, recollect we called attention to a declaration made four years before just as full and comprehensive as it could be, calling for action upon this subject and every branch of it, and we renewed that declaration. I shall refer later on to that declaration, for it is much more emphatic than anything contained in the platform of 1912, emphatic as that declaration was. The platform of 1912 declares:

We renew the declaration in our last platform relating to the conservation of our natural resources and the development of our waterways. The present devastation of the lower Mississippi Valley accentuates the movement for the regulation of river flow by additional bank and levee protection below—and the diversion, storage, and control of the flood waters above—

What follows?—

The diversion, storage, and control of the flood waters above—and their utilization for beneficial purposes in the reclamation of arid and swamp lands and the development of water power instead of permitting the floods to continue, as heretofore, agents of destruction.

During that very campaign upon that platform President Wilson, then Mr. Wilson, a candidate for the Presidency, in a telegram to me, as the president of the National Irrigation Congress, then holding its session at Salt Lake, declared emphatically that he was for the policy which that congress represented, a policy fully as broad as the bill which I have presented, a policy which adopted and approved that bill. In that telegram he not only declared himself in sympathy with the purpose of that Congress but also declared himself in favor of a policy which would by the use of flood waters for every beneficial purpose turn, as he expressed it, these floods from a menace into a blessing. No one could have more happily phrased the whole character of this agitation than that floods were to be changed from a menace into a blessing, according to Mr. Wilson's utterance. That is all the bill which I have been urging for so many years presents, and that is the purpose which the Senator from South Dakota has in view when he presents the needs of the State and the section which he represents, a State, by the by, which, through its legislature, has indorsed the very bill which I have been urging, a bill which has been indorsed from the great Northwest down to Louisiana by numerous States, the States of South Dakota, Louisiana, and Wisconsin being included in the number.

This platform goes on and declares:

We hold that the control of the Mississippi is a national problem—

And so forth.

And applies itself to that work, and a work by the by which is going on, a work which, in my judgment, ought to be accelerated, a work which is fully covered in the bill which I have presented and the amendment to the pending bill which I presented, for there the problem of the Mississippi is taken hold of as a great national problem.

Mr. President, this platform goes on further:

We favor the cooperation of the United States and the respective States in plans for the comprehensive treatment of all waterways with a cooperative plan for channel improvement, with plans for drainage of swamp and overflowed lands, and to this end we favor the appropriation by the Federal Government of sufficient funds to make surveys of such lands, to develop plans for drainage of the same, and to supervise the work of construction.

We favor the adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for the development and improvement of our inland waterways with economy and efficiency, so as to permit their navigation by vessels of standard draft.

The Democratic Party, true to its instinct, demands here economy, but it also demands efficiency, and yet my Democratic friends, fearful of larger taxes, fearful of the creation of debt, are paralyzed when they view the comparatively small expenditure of $60,000,000 annually for a period of 10 years in the execution of this great work.

Mr. President, we might as well abandon all idea of making this Government the great, efficient Government which it should be if we are embarrassed by the consideration of such figures. France has not been embarrassed by such considerations; Germany has not been. To-day we are holding up Germany as the model of efficiency both in military and industrial preparations. The Government there is an active agent in creating a system of military efficiency, of manufacturing efficiency, of commercial efficiency; and in all these lines has spared no expense and has developed the most complete system of coordinated transportation that exists in the world, a system which has resulted in artificializing every stream, making it over by engineering and art, and making it an efficient ally of ocean transportation and rail transportation in the development of cheap transportation, upon which in the end foreign commerce largely depends.

Now, we have been going along with the idea in this country that individualism is the best agency for securing great results. There is no doubt but that the single individual carries more weight in the United States than in any other country in the world. I would not decry this intense individualism, but I would add to it the spirit of coordination and the spirit of governmental cooperation in matters which are without the reach of individual enterprise and action.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From what document is the Senator reading?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The platform of the Democratic Party and the unperformed pledge of the Democratic Party, a pledge which it made seven years ago, and which it renewed three years ago, and which is yet unperformed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why does not the Senator address himself to his associates on the other side of the Chamber? He is looking so longingly over here that we are half of the opinion that that pledge in the Democratic platform is being repudiated, as most of the others have been.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have been so accustomed in the past to addressing myself to the hardened intellects of the other side that I pursue that custom, but I admit that it is much better for me to turn to my side.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This side is not effective when the majority is on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true. The responsibility is here, and I propose to address myself——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope my honored friend will address his associates with his usual fervor and effectiveness.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg the Senator's pardon for directing my eyes in his direction.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As soon as the distinguished Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator, however, whether he is in favor of the bill I am urging.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I had been originally opposed to it I would have long since surrendered my views, for I have heard the Senator speak upon it many times since I have been a Member of the Senate. I could not entertain any view opposed to his own. Impressive and serious and detailed arguments have been advanced here year after year by the Senator, and not only on the floor of the Senate, but in committee rooms where I have been fortunate enough to be associated with him, until at last my own views about this subject matter have given way to the powerful argument of the Senator from Nevada. If he will but turn his attention to the conversion of his own party associates upon the other side of the Chamber, after which his task will be easy over here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I count on the vote of all the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are present?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To be sure. I pledge all my associates on this side.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All your associates?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. All my associates on this side.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will turn my attention to my own side.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly as soon as the Senator can permanently rally his own party associates to his side I pledge him all my associates here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, I assume that the Senator's assurance is not simply a humorous assurance. Is that true?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator can not be misled by my statement, if that side of the Chamber were united this side would, of course, submit cheerfully to the will of the majority. When the honorable Senator succeeded in getting the governors of a number of States to approve his plan and when the very citadel of Democracy, the White House, fell under the fierce bombardment of the Senator and the last Democratic national convention proclaimed its virtue, I felt fully convinced that at last the millennium had finally dawned upon a waiting world.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, that is very gratifying. I now turn to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. I recall that the Senator was very earnest some years ago in pressing the so-called Appalachian and White Mountains bill, a bill under which a commission consisting of several Secretaries of the Cabinet and several Senators and Representatives in Congress were authorized to expend some millions of dollars in the acquisition of forest lands, or, rather, the denuded forest lands in the White Mountains and in the Appalachian Mountains. New England and the South shook hands over that constructive movement, which proposed that the National Government should take hold of these denuded areas which had been deprived of their timber and which were by a process of erosion being rapidly stripped of their soil and treat them in connection with the scheme of regulating and controlling our rivers.

Now, what was the assumption there? The assumption there was that forests have a direct influence over stream flow; that forests are the natural conservators of moisture, taking it in as it falls from the heavens and absorbing it in the roots of the trees and absorbing it in the mulch of the forests, and then gradually giving it out to the streams themselves, thus insuring a gentle instead of a precipitate flow. They began to realize that as these areas were denuded of the forests, the process of soil erosion was taking place, so that gradually the valuable soil would be transferred through the rivers into our bays and oceans, and that ultimately if this matter were not attended to the condition of our mountain areas would resemble that of the mountain areas of China, where through that entire area of mountain heights you will observe that the mountains first denuded of their forests have later on been denuded of their soil until there for hundreds of miles you will see simply an array of white peaks without vegetation of any kind. The productive soil resting upon them has been washed down into the plains below.

Now, then, my friend the Senator from Connecticut aided by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], one of the most conservative Senators in this body, evolved that bill. Yet it had in contemplation so far as New England was concerned simply the conservation of two small rivers—the Merrimac and the Connecticut Rivers. They deemed it, however, of sufficient national importance to take hold of those lands with a view to conserve the waters of those rivers.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I assume the Senator from Nevada is entirely sincere in calling the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to that legislation of three or four years ago, but is it not rather apparent that what the Senator uses in admirable style as a reason for the proposed legislation was used rather as an excuse for the legislation in regard to the Appalachian bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, I would not attribute any unworthy motive, I am sure, to the Senator from Connecticut, and I believe that he had in view—and that he was correct in taking the view—that the interest of his region demanded the conservation of the waters of that region. It is true the waters of New England are not very extensive; that is to say, they do not embrace great rivers. The only rivers, I believe, of any importance outside of Maine being the Merrimac and the Connecticut Rivers. Those rivers are of importance. The Merrimac is, in a measure an arm of the sea, the development of whose lower reaches would promote foreign commerce, and hence the necessity that a deep channel, unobstructed by the débris from the mountains above, should be maintained. As to the Connecticut River, that is a river of much greater consequence, and I regret to say that in the extraordinary railroad development of this country a policy was pursued which prevented the full utilization of that river. The railroads have been permitted to put bridge structures over those rivers that are practically obstructive of navigation, and hence it is impossible to reach by large vessels the city of Springfield and the city of Holyoke, both of them towns of considerable manufacturing importance.

If foresight had been exercised then, if we had determined upon a great national policy regarding the development of our waterways in coordination with our railways, those railway structures would have been so made as not to interfere with commerce; but, as it is now, for 10 years Springfield and Holyoke have been clamoring for an outlet to the sea. They are just beginning to realize in Connecticut that if there were no obstructions and if the waters of that river were conserved above by a proper system of natural and artificial storage in the mountains and the channel properly developed they could make a harbor running from the mouth of the Connecticut River up to Holyoke, on whose banks would rest the great factories of the future, which would transfer their goods immediately, without the interposition of rail transportation, to the great ocean steamers that would carry our products to the world.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. And we have a personal interest in cheapening the cost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the Senator from Nevada finish his sentence, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. We have an interest in diminishing the cost of transportation from those great centers of production to the rest of the world, and, permit me to say, that I think the Senator from Connecticut showed the highest statesmanship in insisting that, at all events, that step should be taken in the direction of the development of the Connecticut River.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada is mistaken if he thinks that the railroad system of New England had anything to do with the prevention of the navigation of the Connecticut River. The trouble about the navigation of the Connecticut River above Hartford has been owing to the character of the channel of the river. It is a solid-rock foundation, and to get the depth of water necessary for commercial vessels of any size to go above Windsor Locks—which is the site of one of the dams to be developed into a great water power under this bill—to get a vessel above that point, as the Senator has a vague recollection, though he has forgotten the cause of it, the Massachusetts people for years have been agitating and advocating before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House and the Committee on Commerce in the Senate a program for a great expenditure of money on a project to dredge the river at that point, where it is rocky, to a proper depth. The project has been repeatedly investigated by the engineers of the War Department, and repeatedly reported adversely upon, on the ground that, while it was feasible, it would require such an enormous expenditure that the commercial advantages to be gained would not warrant its being made at the expense of the General Government. That is all there is to the question of the Connecticut River.

I will take occasion to say, however, while I am on the floor, that I have voted for some bills since I have been a Member of Congress the constitutionality of which I wish I could have been more sure of than I was. Among them was the so-called White Mountain Appalachian Forest Reserve bill, the constitutionality of which was seriously questioned.

I was willing to take the chance on that in view of the great public benefit to be achieved. I voted for the so-called migratory-bird bill, which I had some skepticism about as to its constitutionality. The Supreme Court has just divided evenly on the question of the constitutionality of that measure and have asked for a reargument. My conscience and general "uplift" tendencies may compel me to vote for the so-called child-labor bill, which proposes that the central Government, through a commission or some such divinely inspired institution as that, shall invade every State and city in the country and put embargoes upon the commerce of the State, provided they do not conform in the exercise of what have heretofore been considered as their State rights to the tremendously altitudinous standard that we "uplifters" in Congress may set up for their guidance and government. I do not know; I may vote for it; I am afraid I shall, because for one I am pretty nearly getting worn out in standing up for——

Mr. NEWLANDS. State rights.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes: for some local self-government. I think the time has probably come, Mr. President, when it is necessary to put up to the Supreme Court of the United States some legislation which will elicit from that court an expression of opinion, at least, as to whether this Government is a Union of States or whether it is a centralized, federalized Government, in which all the local concerns of the people at home are to be regulated here in Washington by the Congress and largely by the exercise of its strained powers under the commerce clause of the Constitution or under the power of amendment of that document by three-fourths of the States against the will of the other quarter. So I have no apology to make for having skated on very thin ice on the White Mountain Appalachian Forest Reserve bill. I do not know whether the constitutionality of that measure has yet been determined by the Supreme Court or whether it has ever been called in question.

The Senator from Nevada at that time was just as anxious to fasten this octopus, that he is now nursing, onto the White Mountain Forest Reserve bill as he is now to fasten it onto this bill, after his proposition has been rejected. I told him at the time that if he wanted to kill the White Mountain Forest Reserve bill all he had to do was to fasten this millstone, this "old man of the sea" that he has reared and turned loose upon the country, onto that bill. Inasmuch as he really was not so bad a man as he pretended to be, he finally let loose his strangle hold on my bill and it went through; but the Senator has learned a lesson, and he gave notice the other day that he had so raised his standard of determination that no legislation of any character, no matter how beneficial, concerning anything that had a drop of water in it, should be allowed to go through if he could successfully obstruct it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I said I seriously considered taking such a position.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see that the Senator is carrying out his charitable purpose, and I decline further to coordinate with him in that laudable object. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he is willing to extend the same liberality of view which has distinguished him in his consideration of the White Mountain and Appalachian bill, the child-labor bill, and so forth, to the measure which I have been urging?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, my first name is Frank, and I will be very candid with the Senator. I said to him at the time that I would give serious consideration to his measure whenever he brought it up before the Senate. I hate to incur the Senator's displeasure by admitting that I never have read his measure as yet, and so I would not want to make a hard and fast promise that I shall vote for it; but I agree with him in his general idea that this subject is of vast importance and should be treated in a comprehensive and broad spirit; that there should be some continuous policy inaugurated and carried out, just as I think there should be in the maintenance of our Army and Navy. I think we have pursued very nearly the same foolish program in relation to them as we have in relation to the matter which the Senator is now advocating, and it may result in disaster some day if we continue to decline to look the facts in the face.

All I can say to the Senator is that I believe in the bill which is now before the Senate; I am going to vote for it; I think it ought to pass, and I will give his measure the same consideration that I have given the pending bill, when it comes up, and I think very likely I shall vote for it; but I do not think a great measure like the Senator's ought to be held here in ambush, and whenever a bill comes before the Senate which has the report of a committee back of it and a public sentiment in favor of it and the majority of both parties perhaps wanting to pass it, that he should spring from ambush and seek to ingraft his measure upon it, using everything as a means simply to float his measure through on the back of it. If his measure has merit in it, he ought to let it stand on its merits, discuss it on its merits, and let the Senate vote on it on its merits. I do not believe in passing such great schemes of legislation as mere casual amendments or riders on other bills.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, it is very satisfactory, indeed, to receive even the qualified assurance of the Senator from Connecticut regarding the measure which I have in view. I judge, however, inasmuch as he says he has not read the bill, that it will be necessary for me to inform him regarding it at some stage, and I know of no better opportunity than now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see, Mr. President, that I correctly interpreted the purpose and attitude of the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. I am bent upon informing the Senator from Connecticut, for I realize the value of his aid. When, as the Senator says, I withdrew my strangle hold from the White Mountain Appalachian bill some three or four years ago, upon the assurance of Senators as well known for conservatism as the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from New Hampshire that they would look into this question with a hospitable view at least, I felt that their inquiry would be an early one, and I am exceedingly disappointed to learn that three or four years have passed by and that the Senator from Connecticut as yet has not read the bill. I can assume, therefore, that the only information he has concerning the bill has been the information which he has received upon this floor in the numerous discussions in which I have participated in the Senate regarding it. So I am all the more convinced of the value of these discussions, and the Senator certainly would not have me, zealously guarding, as I am, this measure, withhold any effort to convince his intelligence.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, there is nothing that pleases me more than to listen to the dulcet tones of the Senator's voice. It is like Tennyson's "Brook"; it "goes on forever"; but it is always informing. So the Senator need not withhold any thought that uprises in him on my account. I hope he will take all the time necessary for the full development and coordination of the ideas he is expressing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well, Mr. President. I still find, however, that I can not withdraw my eyes from the other side, much as I would wish to apply them exclusively to my own side.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, if he will permit me, if he does not believe that under the provisions of this bill the navigation of the Connecticut River will be improved, and thereby relieve the difficulties to which the Senator from Nevada has referred this morning?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, I do most certainly. I have confidence enough in whoever may occupy the position of Secretary of War to believe that he would not authorize a great dam to be built across that river unless the locks were of the latest modern type, capable of insuring the passage of vessels of tremendously larger tonnage and draft than those which go through the locks as they are at present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Nevada resumes his remarks the Chair ought to make a statement. Under the rules as they are interpreted, if a Senator yields to more than one question—if he yields a second time—he forfeits the right to address the Senate further on that day on that proposition, since the rules prohibit his right to address the Senate more than twice on the same day on the same question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask if I have forfeited my right to continue?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to hold that the Senator has not forfeited his right as yet, but the next time he yields he will have done so.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the President will allow his heart to be softened in this particular case and permit the Senator from Nevada to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well, the Chair will give the Senator one more chance.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am very anxious to proceed in order, and therefore I will not indulge the desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut another question.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for a question, not for a speech?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will inquire of the President pro tempore if by so doing I will forfeit my right to the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be inclined to hold that if the Senator yields another time he forfeits the floor. The Chair does not think there is anything about this bill, however, the Senator from Tennessee does not already understand.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I regret to say that, under the circumstances, I must decline to yield to the Senator from Tennessee. It is impossible for me to extend him that courtesy.

Mr. SHIELDS. I only wanted to ask the Senator whether, in view of the time the bill has consumed and the many times he has spoken, he will not permit it to come to a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. President, I am very glad to have an opportunity to address myself to the Senator from Connecticut. I would value greatly his support of this measure, as I value greatly the promised support of the Senator from Michigan. I assume that the Senator from Connecticut is supporting the pending measure because he thinks that it will be beneficial not only to the entire country, but to the particular river—the Connecticut—in the State whose interests he in part represents.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] inquired whether this bill will not in the end aid and promote navigation. The answer of the Senator from Connecticut to that was "yes," that it would probably promote navigation on the Connecticut River, for he believes that the wisdom of whoever may be Secretary of War will aid in the proper development of that river. Now, my answer is "yes," provided the work under this bill is done with reference to the dovetailing of that work with a great and comprehensive plan for the full development of our rivers, and "no" if the work under this bill is to be done upon the assumption that the development of our rivers will be as scanty and slow as it has been in the past.

It is one thing to permit an obstruction to a river that is never to be navigated and never made navigable and never artificialized and it is another thing to permit an obstruction in a river with reference to which a public policy has been inaugurated that in the future will lead to the perfect artificialization of that river and its development as an instrumentality of commerce. What I feel is that we are entering into this whole policy at the wrong end. We are viewing this whole subject with the microscope instead of the telescope, and I very much fear that if the operation of this bill is inaugurated during the maintenance of the present policy relating to the development of our rivers the Secretary of War and the engineers operating upon it, when they come to view an obstruction to a river for the purpose of developing water power, will not have in view in any degree the future development and utilization of that river for every purpose, but will simply view that river as it stands to-day—an unorganized and undeveloped possibility for commerce.

My friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I think, gave me somewhat stronger assurances regarding my bill when I relieved his bill of the amendment which I proposed; but I am not willing to attempt to hold anyone to an obligation which does not recommend itself to his reason. Hence I shall abandon altogether the obligation regarding past assurances and address myself simply to convincing the judgment of the Senator in the present.

The measure which he proposed was simply a detached portion of a great problem, and the most remote portion of a great problem. Instead of determining in the first instance to develop our rivers upon a broad and comprehensive scale—a policy which never yet has been determined upon by our Government—the Congress of the United States committed itself simply to a detail, which will be entirely without results unless the greater policy and plan are inaugurated. Take the acquisition of large areas of mountain lands in the White Mountains and in the Appalachian Mountains, which have been denuded of their forests: Unless you conclude to make these rivers real instruments of commerce, why should the National Government acquire those lands? Certainly not for agriculture itself, certainly not for forestry itself, but only in aid of interstate commerce. That is the constitutional power under which the Congress of the United States acted. And what relation had these deforested areas to interstate commerce? Why, simply the very remote relation that in order to maintain interstate commerce on a stream it is necessary that you shall have a steady flow, not a fitful flow—not a torrent one month and a drought the next month—and that these waters, constantly flowing to the oceans and gulfs, must be reinforced every month in the year and every day in the year from remote sources, and that the natural storage of water in forests and in the soil constitutes one of the most valuable sources for the maintenance of stream flow throughout the year. Denude the mountains of their forests, deprive them of their soil, strip them to the rock, or cover them entirely with concrete, and you will have a surface that will precipitate the water immediately to the tributary streams and thence to the great rivers, thus causing these enormous floods that are so destructive. Then, later on, when the period of drought comes, there are no forested areas, no soil areas, the natural reservoirs from which the absorbed water can flow gradually into the tributaries and streams and feed the stream flow, and then you have the period of drought. Either of these conditions is prejudicial to navigation and to interstate commerce; and it is for that remote reason that the United States is justified in acquiring these forested areas at the head of navigable rivers.

The difficulty is that local interests, and perhaps private interests, intervene so as to bring about the speedy action of the Government upon mere detached portions of a great problem, whilst the great problem itself, resting simply upon the general interest for its promotion, receives no attention. Hence it is that projects for the purpose of acquiring forested areas, projects for the erection of water-power dams, projects for the digging of a channel at a particular place, involving an expenditure of money in that locality, receive consideration when a great public policy, involving the general public good, receives no consideration whatever.

So, Mr. President, having acquired, at the instance of Senators representing these various States, in the Appalachian and White Mountain regions, at the cost of millions of dollars, large deforested areas, whose use to the National Government will depend absolutely upon the development of a great water policy, we find that those very representatives, able and conscientious as they are, halt with the completion of the detached portion, and do not energetically pursue action upon the great policy the adoption of which alone would justify their action in the first place. And so my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], instead of being an earnest, fighting advocate of a great policy which is the natural outgrowth of the detached, the individual project which he sustained with so much ability and energy, now addresses himself with humor and satire—of which I do not complain—to the consideration of the great policy. I have had no volunteer helpful word from him. I have had no volunteer helpful word from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who, I am sorry to say, is not here, for I know if he were here I would have a contention out of him in a moment, as he never fails to respond to a challenge. That is what I complain of, and that is the reason why I am persistent in urging this measure whenever I have the opportunity. I regard it as a great public duty; and I believe that this project has only to be presented to the Senate and the Congress of the United States in its fullness and completeness to reach final acceptance.

You ask, "Why does not a Senator who is insistent upon a great policy of this kind content himself with one speech? Is he not addressing himself to men of the highest intelligence, the select men of the Nation?" Yes; but unfortunately he is addressing himself to men of large occupations and varied interests, men overwhelmed with the demands of their constituents in the way of correspondence, men overwhelmed with the responsibilities of committee duties, men overwhelmed with the responsibility relating to certain measures that are in their charge. Hence, except in some condition of excitement, the Senate Chamber is almost empty for the greater part of the time, only 5 or 6 or 8 or 10 Senators being able to stay consecutively in the Chamber at any particular time and listen to what is going on. The result is that if a Senator is intent upon educational work regarding a great policy the only thing he can do is to take up this question at detached times and address the audience that is here, whether it be great or small, and by endless persistency finally reach the intellects of all. In addition to this, with reference to a great policy, it is essential to conduct the discussion in such a way, both in and out of this Chamber, as to arrest the public attention and to create that dominating public opinion which is essential to successful legislation.

So, notwithstanding the satire of the Senator from Connecticut and his fear that "this brook may run on forever," I shall continue, whenever I have the opportunity, the presentation and discussion of this question.

I have referred to the platform of 1912. I have shown how clear and distinct its requirements are. Let us see what the platform of 1908, to which it refers and whose expressions it renews, says upon this subject. There is a plank in that platform on the subject of waterways. It is as follows:

> Water furnishes the cheaper means of transportation, and the National Government, having the control of navigable waters, should improve them to their fullest capacity. We earnestly favor the immediate adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for improving every watercourse in the Union which is justified by the needs of commerce, and to secure that end we favor, when practicable, the connection of the Great Lakes with the navigable rivers and with the Gulf through the Mississippi River, and the navigable rivers with each other, by artificial canals, with a view of perfecting a system of inland waterways to be navigated by vessels of standard draft.
> We favor—

Here comes this measure that I am urging:

> We favor the coordination of the various services of the Government connected with waterways in one service, for the purpose of aiding in the completion of such a system of inland waterways, and we favor the creation of a fund ample for continuous work, which shall be conducted under the direction of a commission of experts to be authorized by law.

Can there be anything more complete? Can there be anything that covers more fully and completely the provisions of the bill I have been urging?

Not content with that, the platform goes on to declare:

> We repeat the demand for internal development and for the conservation of our natural resources contained in previous platforms, the enforcement of which Mr. Roosevelt has vainly sought from a reluctant party; and to that end we insist upon the preservation, protection, and replacement of needed forests, the preservation of the public domain for home seekers, the protection of the national resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control, the development of our waterways for navigation, and every other useful purpose, including the irrigation of arid lands, the reclamation of swamp lands, the clarification of streams, the development of water power, and the preservation of electric power generated by this natural force from the control of monopoly; and to such end we urge the exercise of all powers, National, State, and municipal, both separately and in cooperation.

What does this reference to Mr. Roosevelt mean? It declares that Mr. Roosevelt has vainly sought from a reluctant party the establishment of this policy. We all know that after the irrigation bill became a law Mr. Roosevelt became immensely interested in the entire conservation policy. Mr. Roosevelt had the remarkable quality of seeking information everywhere and absorbing it, and absorbing it quickly, and of putting his information into some practical form. Toward the close of his administration he found the majority of his party opposed to him, and opposed to him largely upon the conservation policy, and the reference in this platform is to his failure to obtain support in that policy from a reluctant, not a supporting, party.

So we not only promised ourselves but we indicted the Republican Party for failing to take action upon this important question, and that was seven years ago, let me tell my associates on this side of the Chamber, and we were beaten in that campaign. Four years ago we were fortunate enough to present to the people of the United States a candidate and a platform in which, having upbraided the Republican Party for nonaction, we pledged our party to specific and definite action. We have been in power since that time—three years—with that promise unperformed.

Mr. President, I realize that there have been many disturbing obstacles in the way. We had to take up the tariff question first, the banking question second, and the trust question third. We were engaged in great correctional legislation. Whilst I have indulged in some criticisms as to the speed of our progress, whilst I thought that we went too fast perhaps and too far, I have no doubt that the general direction of that legislation was the right direction. It produced industrial disturbances which might, if continued, have imperiled the party to which we belong in its continuance in power and thus destroyed our very opportunity to do the things which we had promised.

So, in a speech of some months ago, I called attention to the things which we had done in legislation and to the things that we had left undone, and I suggested that, as to certain mistakes that we had made, we should correct them and as to the things left undone we should do them. That speech was misinterpreted by some of my party associates and regarded as an act of unfriendly criticism. On the contrary, it was, in my judgment, the performance of the highest duty that a party man owes to his party, to give to that party, with absolute candor, his conception of the mistaken things they have done with a view to their correction and with a view that the things which they have left undone they should do while the opportunity is at hand.

Now, this is one of the things which you have to do. This is one of the things which the Democratic Party in power has to do. We are considering great things from a military point of view under a condition which devotes nearly one-half of our national revenue to wars of the past or to preparation for war in the future. We propose to increase that expenditure. I do not decry that policy. All that I contend is that before going on to large expenditures we should make the organization which we have not only an efficient one but an economical one, and as it is I believe that it is both inefficient and uneconomical.

I believe we are approaching the question now in an inefficient and a detached way. We have before us the single problem of national defense. That is the unit, divided into two branches—the Army and the Navy. How are we considering this great question? As a unit? No; in a detached way, as we have always done. Five committees to-day are sitting on this subject which ought to be one subject—the Military Committee and the Naval Committee of the House, similar committees of the Senate, and the subcommittee of the Committee on Fortifications in the House, five in all. Witnesses are moving around from one committee to another giving their statements. The newspaper men are unable to keep up with them, and so they are unable to inform the public, who ought to be informed of the different stages of this investigation.

Congress, one of the most intelligent organizations in the world, is pursuing most inefficient methods. A very simple method would be to bring every one of these committees into coordination through the appointment of a joint subcommittee of from three to five from each, so that they would consider the national defense in its entirety and present to us either a single plan or majority and minority plans for our consideration, thus focusing the attention of the entire country upon national defense as a unit—the part the Army shall have in it, the part the Navy shall have in it, and the total expenditures for both. We are not doing it.

I refer to this because it was referred to by the Senator from Connecticut. We could, if we would trust such a subcommittee, I believe, bring this inquiry to a conclusion. We could ascertain what kind of a military establishment we could get for $250,000,000, what kind of a naval establishment for $300,000,000 and for $350,000,000 and $400,000,000, and then we could make a choice. As it is, we will be involved in confusion when this subject comes before us between the contending opinions of committees upon detached portions of the great question.

It is said that because of these military preparations we should halt our constructive work; that we should attend now simply to the work of destruction and should abandon the promised work of construction. The work upon needed public buildings is to halt, the development of our rivers is to halt, until we can organize our Army and our Navy efficiently; and we are going about the organization of the Army and the Navy in such an inefficient way that it can scarcely fail to secure the disapproval of the country.

Mr. President, I believe in military efficiency, and I believe in industrial efficiency. I believe in taking hold of the question of our military establishment in some vigorous and efficient way, dealing with it as a whole, and not in detached portions. I also believe in taking hold of the commercial problems of this country not in a detached way but in a comprehensive and full way. I believe in performing our obligations to the people, the solemn obligations that were declared in the platforms of 1908 and 1912.

We find that the devastating forces of nature have been operative during this period. Fifty million dollars or more of loss has occurred in the State of Ohio; $25,000,000 recently in the State of Kansas. We find the people of the entire delta of the Mississippi living in a state of apprehension. But just as the development of the northern area improves, just as swamp lands are brought into reclamation there, just as every obstacle to the flow of water is removed in the interest of scientific cultivation and otherwise, just the more rapidly do these waters which ought to be put to more beneficial use move on to their destructive activities in the region below.

I saw only two winters ago the city of New Orleans with a river fronting it 3 miles, I should say, in width, with a depth of 150 feet, swirling waters within a foot and a half of the top of the levees, and upon the other side of the levees I saw a great city 24 feet below the level of the water. The least defect in that levee, a rat hole, might precipitate a crevasse and break and overwhelm that great city. Yet viewing possible complications in the future that may arise from the aggression of the forces of man in Europe, we neglect entirely the present dangers that are facing us every day from the destructive forces of nature.

Mr. President, a responsibility rests upon the Democratic Party which it can not escape. You may say that there is a deficit of revenue. If so, restore and increase the revenue. You may say that a required expenditure of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 is needed for military defense. If so, increase the revenue, but do not let those necessities prevent you from doing the constructive work which you have pledged to the country, upon which the industrial and commercial activities of the country hereafter depend.

We have expended nearly $500,000,000 upon the Panama Canal. Why? To promote commerce in the main, commerce between the two coasts. Supplementary to that we have had in view always the full development of the entire Mississippi River and its tributaries. One work has been done. The other work is unaccomplished. What is the result of this? The result of the work thus far has been simply to disturb the equilibrium, to give the coast cities of the Pacific coast and of the Atlantic coast the advantages of through waterway transportation in communicating with each other, in which the Mississippi Valley does not share. So the great industries of the Mississippi Valley are compelled to halt until the equilibrium of condition is restored. To-day the Mississippi Valley is feeling the loss of trade with the Pacific coast which it used to enjoy, for when both the Eastern coast and the Mississippi Valley in their trade with the Pacific coast were obliged to rely upon rail the Mississippi Valley had the advantage of the East because of the shortness of the distance.

When you substitute for transportation by rail between the two coasts this cheap waterway transportation through the canal, then the eastern coast and its activities and industries have an advantage over those of the Mississippi Valley. So fairness and justice as between sections means that you should develop the waterway system of the country in all its fullness, and bring the Mississippi River and its tributaries in immediate and rapid and easy coordination with the Panama Canal. They will demand it.

You will find that this matter will be the subject of discussion during the next campaign. In the Mississippi Valley, the great source of political strength in this country, what will be the answer of the Democratic Party? The answer of the Democratic Party will be that we helped the Republican Party to inaugurate and carry through the great Isthmian Canal with an expenditure of $500,000,000. We reproached that party for not fulfilling its pledges regarding the waterway development of the country, with a view of bringing it into coordination with that Isthmian Canal. We promised in two campaigns the fullest and most complete action, involving the creation of an ample fund—that is the term we used—involving cooperation of services and cooperation of sovereignties and immediate work. We have been in power three years and a half and we have done nothing.

I presume many of my friends will regard that as critical of my party, and as perhaps being uttered in an unfriendly spirit, or, at all events, in an indiscreet spirit.

Mr. President, I have no faith in indirection, either in business or in politics. I believe in candor, and that man best serves his friends and his party who deals in candor. The utterance which I make to-day, in friendliness of spirit, with a view to the recovery of our position if we act quickly, is the greatest service that a party man can render to his party at this juncture.

Mr. President, the condition of the Senate Chamber at this moment is indicative of what I referred to, as to the necessity of speaking frequently upon a subject to which any Senator may address himself.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For what purpose does the Senator from Tennessee rise?

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that Jefferson's Manual is an authority in the procedure and practice of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has a certain degree of influence, but is not a direct authority.

Mr. SHIELDS. A point of order, Mr. President. I find in Jefferson's Manual, at page 95, this rule:

> No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously, or tediously.

Mr. President, we have heard the remarks of the Senator now repeated for the third time on this bill, and I insist that this authority is applicable to him. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not at this time adopt that view. The point of order will not be sustained, as advised at present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I quite believe in the rule which the Senator from Tennessee has invoked, and I hope myself to invoke it in the future. I would be very glad to see a system of reasonable limitation of debate evolved in the Senate which would secure the attendance and the attention of Senators. If my remarks are to be regarded as long drawn out and tedious, I will state it is the result of the system which prevails in the Senate, a system which invites long discussion with few auditors, and which compels any Senator who wants to get his idea to more than four or five to repeat himself over and over again, and to respond to new inquiries coming from Senators who did not chance to be in the Chamber when the subject matter already exhaustively treated was under consideration.

As the result of my training in the House of Representatives and my legal training before I went to the House I was able at any time to say all that I had to say upon any subject in an hour. I came to the Senate and I found the process of dilution going on here, and I gradually fell into the habit of the Senate and found its wisdom. If you can not have more than 10 Senators in the Chamber at any one time and you want to get the attention of 90 Senators, it will be necessary for you to repeat your speech nine times.

Mr. President, I shall not longer trespass upon the sensibilities of my friend from Tennessee. I will simply say in closing that if I can receive any substantial indication from a sufficient number of this body that they think this matter is of sufficient importance to require action, I will yet introduce in some modified form the amendment which was under consideration by the Senate this morning during my absence.

I believe that this is the time to act, because the subject is before us. I believe that if we do act now by amending this bill, a complete river-regulation bill, involving every use to which water can be used, will go to the House of Representatives and knock at the door there and demand action; it will be sustained by a public sentiment throughout the country that will force action; and I believe that if we lose this opportunity now we may not be able to recover it.

I urge these considerations not with any unfriendly spirit to the committee that has the pending bill under consideration or with any unfriendly spirit toward the bill itself. I urge it as a means of securing all that the Senator from Tennessee desires, and at the same time securing all that every intelligent friend of waterway development desires.

The amendment to which the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] were addressed is as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. NEWLANDS to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, viz: Insert at the end of the bill the following:

"SEC. 16. That the sum of $60,000,000 annually for each of the 10 years following the 1st day of July, 1917, is hereby reserved, set aside, and appropriated, and made available until expended, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the "river-regulation fund," to be used to promote interstate commerce by the development and improvement of the rivers and waterways of the United States and their connections with the Great Lakes and with each other, and by the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes and transportation, and the establishment and maintenance of adequate terminal and transfer facilities and systems, and their maintenance, improvement, and protection, and by the making of examinations and surveys and by the construction of engineering and other works and projects for the regulation and control of the flow of rivers and their tributaries and source streams, and the standardization of such flow, and by the maintenance of navigable stages of water at all seasons of the year in the waterways of the United States, and by preventing silt and sedimentary material from being carried into, and deposited in, waterways, channels, and harbors, and by the conservation, development, and utilization of the water resources of the United States, and by flood prevention and protection, through the establishment, construction, and maintenance of natural and artificial reservoirs for water storage and control, and the protection of watersheds from denudation, erosion, and surface wash and from forest fires, and the maintenance and extension of woodland and other protective cover thereon, and the reclamation of swamp and overflow lands and arid lands and the building of drainage and irrigation works, in order that the flow of rivers shall be regulated and controlled not only through the use of flood waters for irrigation on the upper tributaries, but also through controlling them in fixed and established channels, in the lower valleys and plains, and by doing all things necessary to provide for any and all beneficial uses of water that will contribute to its conservation or storage in the ground or in surface reservoirs as an aid to the regulation or control of the flow of rivers, and by acquiring, holding, using, and transferring lands and any other property that may be needed for the aforesaid purposes, and by doing such other things as may be specified in this act or necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes thereof, and by securing the cooperation therein of States, municipalities, and other local agencies, as hereinafter set forth, and for the payment of all expenditures provided for in this act; the ultimate purpose of this act being the maintenance at all times of a navigable stage of water in all inland waterways, and flood prevention and protection, and river regulation and the control of the volume of water forming the stage of the river from its sources, so as to standardize the river flow, as contradistinguished from and supplemental to channel improvement as heretofore undertaken and provided for under the various acts commonly known as river and harbor acts.

"CREATION OF THE WATERWAYS COMMISSION AND THE BOARD OF RIVER REGULATION.

"SEC. 17. That a commission is hereby created, to be known as the 'Waterways Commission,' consisting of the President of the United States, who shall be the chairman of said commission, with the power of veto; the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the board of river regulation, to be appointed as hereinafter provided. The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission shall be ex officio advisory members of said Waterways Commission.

"The waterways commission shall have authority to direct and control all proceedings and operations and all things done or to be done under this act, and to establish all rules and regulations which may, in their judgment, be necessary to carry into effect such direction and control consistent with the provisions of this act and with existing law and with any provisions which Congress may from time to time enact.

"All plans and estimates prepared by the board of river regulation, as hereinafter provided, which contemplate or provide for expenditures from the river regulation fund, shall be submitted to the waterways commission for final approval before any of the expenditures therein provided for or contemplated are authorized or made, or any construction work undertaken or contracts let under or in pursuance of such plans: Provided, That in case of an emergency the chairman of the board of river regulation shall have full power to act, and shall report in detail his action in every case to the waterways commission at its next meeting after his action.

"The members of said commission shall serve as such only during their incumbency in their respective official positions, and any vacancy on the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

"A board is hereby created, to be known as the 'board of river regulation,' consisting of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, the chairman of the Mississippi River Commission, the Director of the United States Geological Survey, the Director of the Reclamation Service, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, the Forester of the Department of Agriculture, the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Fisheries, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, one civil engineer, one sanitary engineer, one hydroelectric engineer, one expert in transportation, and a chairman of the board. The last seven shall be appointed by the President and hold office at his pleasure, and they shall each receive an annual compensation of $10,000, except the chairman, who shall receive $12,000, and they shall receive a per diem in lieu of actual expenses when absent from headquarters on official business, to be determined by the waterways commission. Such compensation and per diem, together with all the general expenses of the board, shall be payable out of the appropriation hereinafter apportioned to the Smithsonian Institution. The members of said board, with the exception of the seven members appointed by the President, shall serve as such only during their incumbency in their respective official positions, and any vacancy on the board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

"The seven members of the board appointed by the President shall constitute an executive committee, of which the chairman of the board shall be chairman, and said executive committee shall have the general executive direction and supervision of the operations of said board of river regulation under rules and regulations to be established by the waterways commission.

"A secretary of the board shall be appointed by the executive committee, and shall hold office at their pleasure, and he shall receive an annual compensation of $5,000 and a per diem when absent from headquarters on official business to be determined by the waterways commission, payable out of the appropriation hereinafter apportioned for the Smithsonian Institution.

"All formal action taken and all expenditures made or authorized by the board of river regulation shall be reported to the waterways commission and shall be by the commission transmitted to Congress annually, or at such more frequent times as may appear to the commission desirable, or at such times as Congress may require.

"Whenever, in their judgment, it may be advisable, in order to expedite construction, the waterways commission may order such construction work as they may determine to be done under the immediate direction, by contract or otherwise, of the executive committee, in which case such work shall be paid for from the apportionment of the service or bureau or organization under which it would otherwise have been done, such transfer and application of any apportionment made by this act being hereby authorized.

"The Waterways Commission may, if at any time it shall be in their judgment advisable, appoint from the public service additional members of the Board of River Regulation; and they may also create and appoint from the public service the members of subordinate boards or commissions to promote the purposes of this act and expedite and facilitate the administration thereof and operations and construction thereunder.

"COOPERATION WITH STATES, MUNICIPALITIES, AND OTHER AGENCIES.

"SEC. 18. That the board of river regulation shall, in all cases where possible and practicable, encourage, promote, and endeavor to secure the cooperation of States, municipalities, public and quasi-public corporations, towns, counties, districts, communities, persons, and associations in the carrying out of the purposes and objects of this act, and in making the investigations and doing all coordinative and constructive work provided for herein; and it shall in each case endeavor to secure the financial cooperation of States and of such local authorities, agencies, and organizations to such extent and in such amounts as the Waterways Commission shall determine to be a just and equitable apportionment of work, costs, and benefits, under all the circumstances, in each case; and it shall negotiate and perfect arrangements and plans for the apportionment of work, cost, and benefits, according to the jurisdiction, powers, rights, and benefits of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as can be properly undertaken by the United States by virtue of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and promote the general welfare, and by reason of its proprietary interest in the public domain, and to the States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portion as properly belongs to their jurisdiction, rights, and interests, and with a view to properly apportioning costs and benefits, and with a view to so uniting the plans and works of the United States within its jurisdiction, and of the States and municipalities, respectively, within their jurisdictions, and of corporations, communities, and individuals within their respective powers and rights, as to secure the highest development and utilization of the waterways and water resources of the United States: Provided, however, That the control of the Mississippi River shall be regarded as a national problem, imposing an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government for the preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property which has resulted therefrom, and that the Mississippi River shall be improved and developed as a national waterway, exclusively under the control of the Federal Government, and all work connected with the creation and maintenance of such a national waterway, including levees, revetments, bank-protective work, floodwater channels, outlets, spillways, and all work thereon herein contemplated or provided for, shall be done exclusively by and at the cost of the National Government.

"The board may receive and use any funds or property donated or subscribed to it or in any way provided for cooperative work, but no moneys shall be expended under any arrangement for cooperation until the funds to be provided by all parties to such arrangement shall have been made available for disbursement.

"ENCOURAGEMENT OF INDEPENDENT INITIATIVE AND CONSTRUCTION.

"SEC. 19. That all things done under this act shall be done with a view not only to constructive cooperation, as herein provided, but also with the definite and specific object of enlarging the field of accomplishment contemplated by the act through promoting and encouraging independent initiative and construction by States, municipalities, districts, and other local agencies and organizations, and creating object lessons and building models and making demonstrations that will have that effect and influence, and induce such supplemental and independent action and construction.

"CONFERENCE AND COOPERATION OF BUREAUS AND STATES.

"SEC. 20. That it shall be the duty of said board to coordinate and bring into conference and cooperation the various scientific and constructive bureaus of the United States with each other and with the representatives of States, muncipalities, public and quasi-public corporations, towns, counties, districts, communities, and associations, and of foreign nations on international streams, in the carrying out and accomplishment of all the provisions, purposes, and objects of this act.

"The board shall have authority to call upon and to bring into cooperation any other Federal department or bureau whose investigations or assistance may be found necessary to the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and the board is hereby authorized to defray the expenses of such investigations or assistance through a transfer of so much of its appropriation as may be necessary to the Federal department or bureau thus brought into cooperation.

"CORRELATION, COMBINATION, AND ADMINISTRATIVE ECONOMY.

"SEC. 21. That the board shall harmonize and unify and bring into correlation and coordination the investigations made and information, data, and facts collected and obtained by the various bureaus or offices of the Government relating to or connected with the matters and subjects referred to and the questions involved in this act, and to print, publish, and disseminate the same, and it shall exercise such general supervision as may be necessary to provide against duplication or unnecessary, inadequate, unrelated, or incomplete work in connection therewith, and shall make such recommendations to the Waterways Commission as it may deem advisable at any time for the accomplishment of that end or in the interest of harmonious cooperation, efficiency, and economy in carrying out the purposes of this act. The special function of the board at all times shall be to promote the adoption of the best and most approved methods and systems of investigation, administration, construction, and operation, in carrying out such specific improvements, works, and projects as are authorized by this act, or which may be from time to time authorized by Congress, if within the scope of the work of the said board as herein set forth; and it shall further be the special function of the board to effect the largest possible saving as the result of the unification, correlation, and coordination of the work of the various bureaus in the investigations and administrative and constructive work provided for in this act in accordance with existing law or with such provisions as Congress shall from time to time impose.

"REPORTS, PLANS, AND ESTIMATES BY THE BOARD.

"SEC. 22. That the functions of the board shall be to obtain full information through its members concerning all proposed expenditures provided for within the scope of this act. Each bureau or service chief member shall report to the board the work proposed by the bureau or organization which he represents and shall present full plans and estimates covering such proposed construction or action. The findings and conclusions of the board and plans adopted by it for construction and action shall be binding upon the members thereof in so far as may be consistent with existing laws.

"REFERENCES TO AND INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE PRESIDENT.

"SEC. 23. That all matters involving apparent conflict with departmental authority, jurisdiction, or procedure, or as to which the board may desire suggestions or advice, shall be laid before the President, who may thereupon call into conference the Waterways Commission, and after consideration of such matters by the commission, suitable instructions shall be issued by the President to heads of departments with a view to securing unity of action along the lines approved by the President and the commission.

"EXECUTION OF PLANS AND WORK BY THE SEVERAL BUREAUS.

"SEC. 24. That in the execution of all plans and duties intrusted or delegated to the several bureaus the respective chiefs thereof, acting under departmental regulations and procedure, shall execute the work according to the methods prescribed by law, the functions of the board of river regulation being those of a consulting and advisory body with power to make recommendations to the President and the Waterways Commission, and through the President to the heads of departments, with a view to effective coordination and cooperation as to all things proposed by this act, and to carry out such work as Congress shall from time to time prescribe or has prescribed in this act.

"COMPREHENSIVE PLANS FOR RIVER REGULATION.

"SEC. 25. That the board of river regulation shall develop, formulate, prepare, consider, and determine upon comprehensive plans for the conservation, use, and development of the water and forest resources of the United States in such manner as will best regulate the flow of rivers and their tributaries and source streams, and the stage of water in inland waterways, and the confinement of all rivers and waterways at all times within fixed and established channels, and embracing, with that object, the construction of levees and revetments and all works necessary for the fixation of channels and flood protection, drainage, and the reclamation of swamp and overflow lands; water storage in natural and artificial reservoirs; the beneficial use of waters for irrigation and for all domestic, municipal, and industrial purposes; the maintenance and development of underground water supplies and the storage of water in the ground and in irrigated lands and underground reservoirs; the enlargement of the areas and raising of the levels of the ground waters; the construction of flood-water canals, by-passes, and restraining dams; the control and regulation of drainage and the replenishment of streams by return seepage; the perpetuation of forests and maintenance of woodland cover as sources of stream flow; the prevention of denudation and erosion; the protection of channels and harbors from eroded soil materials; the clarification of streams; the utilization of water power; the prevention of the pollution of streams and rivers; the sanitary disposal of sewage and purification of water supplies; the best distribution of forests, woodlands, and other growth, and of cultivated and irrigated areas in their relation to river flow; the protection of forested and woodland areas from destruction by fire or insects; the reforestation of denuded areas; the planting of forests and establishment of forest plantations; the preservation and planting of woodlands and any other growth and protective cover on watersheds; the increase and development of the porosity and absorbent qualities and storage capacity of the soil upon which rain or snow may fall; the making and furnishing of plans for flood-water storage and other works for irrigation and power for farms, towns, and villages; the acquisition, subdivision, and settlement in small, intensively cultivated farms of lands for water storage by irrigation; the building of the irrigation systems for such lands, including reservoirs, dams, canals, ditches, and all necessary works; the protection of farms, villages, towns, and municipalities from damage by freshets and overflow; and the impounding of flood waters in artificial lakes and storage reservoirs to prevent floods and overflows, erosion of river banks, and breaks in levees, and to regulate the flow of streams and reenforce such flow during drought and low-water periods, the ultimate object of all such work being to regulate and, so far as possible, standardize the flow of rivers and their tributaries and source streams, and in the accomplishment of that object to induce and secure the cooperation of States, municipalities, districts, counties, towns, and other local agencies and organizations.

"SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

"SEC. 26. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution to give especial attention to the acquisition from foreign countries and from all sources of all obtainable knowledge concerning the problems involved in the work of the board and to diffuse and disseminate the same, and to establish and maintain a museum of water and forest resources in which such knowledge shall be placed before the people, with object lessons illustrating the disastrous consequences that have resulted from the neglect of such conservation and particularly the failure to conserve the forest and water resources in other countries of the world, and to utilize the resources of the institution under his charge, which may be available for that purpose, to aid in the education of the public in the elements of knowledge which lead to the successful regulation of water and of the flow of rivers and the use of water in connection with agriculture and the intensive cultivation of land, and in connection with all other industries.

"DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

"SEC. 27. That it shall be the duty of the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture to collate and bring together for the information of the board the results of all investigations with reference to soil and the production of crops through the use of water as a fertilizer and stimulant to plant growth, and of the relation of water in excess or deficiency to successful crop production. He shall recommend for the consideration of the board such further investigations as may properly be conducted in connection with the purposes for which the board is created and which shall lead to the largest and most valuable results being obtained through the use of water in connection with successful plant growth and increased crop production, and the establishment of a national system for the information of the people in the intensive cultivation of small tracts of land, with a view to increasing food production and thereby reducing the cost of living and encouraging suburban and rural settlement and home making, and the beneficial use of water in connection therewith as an ultimate influence for river regulation in aid of interstate commerce.

"FOREST SERVICE.
